SEVENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The Lord himself is our keeper; the Lord is our defense upon our right hand. Great peace have they who love Thy law. The Lord God will preserve our going out and our coming in from this time forth; praise ye the Lord. Heavenly Father, may we be faithful and manly, and, wherever we are, may we fill the measure of love and peace with all that is best. We pray Thee to grant Thy blessing upon all conditions of men. Kindle again the extinguished torch of their disappointments. Use us, blessed Lord, to perform all deeds of kindness; to encourage some forgotten friend of our childhood; to help some struggling youth to his ambition; and to some darkened home may we bring hope. Heavenly Father, keep us mindful these days of the earthly calendar of our Lord, the vastness of His dominion, His majesty, the sweep of His intelligence, and the eternity of His being, and unto Thee be all glory both now and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 272. Joint resolution to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to accept title for the United States to certain real property to be donated by Mr. Henry Ford and wife for Veterans' Administration facility purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 4720. An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 217. Joint resolution providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) entitled "Joint resolution making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. SMITH, Mr. WHEELER, Mr. GILLETTE, and Mr. CAPPER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but I shall have to object.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GROVER CLEVELAND

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to announce this is the anniversary of the birth of Grover Cleveland, the great Democratic President who suppressed the strike in Chicago in 1894.

THE NEUTRALITY ACT OF 1937

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 32]

Binderup	Dingell	Jenckes, Ind.	Nichols
Bradley	Ditter	Kelly, N. Y.	O'Brien, Mich.
Buckley, N. Y.	Dixon	Kniffin	Schaefer, Ill.
Burdick	Doxey	Lamneck	Scrugham
Cannon, Wis.	Drew, Pa.	Lesinski	Smith, Va.
Casey, Mass.	Duncan	Lewis, Md.	Tinkham
Chapman	Frey, Pa.	McClellan	Tolan
Cole, N. Y.	Gasque	McCormack	Vincent, B. M.
Connery	Goodwin	McGehee	Weaver
Cravens	Hancock, N. Y.	McGranery	Withrow
Crosby	Harlan	McGroarty	Wood
Crowther	Havenner	Maas
Curley	Healey	Mahon, S. C.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seventy-seven Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, the neutrality bill of 1937, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose last Tuesday section 2 of the joint resolution had been read and is now open to amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPORT OF ARMS, AMMUNITION, AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to any belligerent state, named in the proclamation, or to any neutral state for transhipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state.

(b) The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to other states as and when they may become involved in such war.

(c) Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state and that such armed conflict is of such a magnitude or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such state or to any other state for transshipment to, or for use in, the state named in the proclamation.

(d) The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, or implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this section.

(e) When in the judgment of the President the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation or proclamations have ceased to exist he shall revoke the same and the provisions hereof shall thereupon cease to apply, except with respect to offenses committed, or forfeitures incurred prior to such revocation.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 19, line 9, after section 3 (a), strike out all of page 19 and on page 20 down through line 8. On line 9, change paragraph (d) to (b). Strike out all of paragraph (e). Insert the following, so as to read:

"SEC. 3. (a) It shall be unlawful to export, or attempt to export or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States in peace or war."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the leadership of the House for providing 10 hours of general debate. There were those doubters who believed there would not be sufficient requests for time to warrant considering this bill for 10 hours. As a matter of fact, near the conclusion of the debate we had to cut down some of the requests to 4 minutes and in some instances to 1 minute.

Debate on both sides of the House has been conducted on a very high order and plane, and, as far as I am concerned, on a nonpartisan basis. I am making my appeal, as I did when I spoke first in this House, that this bill be considered purely on its merits and on a nonpartisan basis. It is a question of war and of peace or declaring the peace policy of the United States.

During the World War Republicans and Democrats served alongside each other shoulder to shoulder, not as Republicans and Democrats but as Americans. We served under a great war President, our Commander in Chief, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.] There was no question of politics once you were in the Army. You served as Americans and you died as Americans. It was only toward October or November 1918 that Woodrow Wilson himself injected the partisan angle by asking for the election of a Democratic Congress, which was a colossal political blunder. Later on came the question of the League of Nations, which, unfortunately, developed a political angle. As far as peace or war is concerned, there should be no partisanship, and I am pleading for the consideration of the amendment on the basis of merit and merit alone. It is a question of war and of peace or declaring the peace policy of the United States.

The amendment I have offered is a very simple one. The present law today provides that it is unlawful to ship arms, ammunition, and implements of war in time of war to belligerent nations. Everybody is for this. I want to make this provision applicable also in time of peace. [Applause.] Why should we sell arms to nations preparing for war in order to go to war for the sake of profit, greed, and blood money? Why should we prepare the nations of the world for war and become the symbol of arms, ammunition, and the dollar sign for wholesale slaughter?

I submit in all sincerity and all good faith that with many foreign nations arming to the teeth, going mad building armaments, and spending $15,000,000,000 this year—three times as much as they spent 3 years ago and four times as much as they spent back in 1914—if we are sincere, if we are in good faith at all about this bill, we ought to extend its provisions against shipment of arms in time of peace as well as time of war. [Applause.]

I hope, if the gentlemen and gentlewomen of this House vote down this amendment, we will have a chance—and I am going to give it to you—to vote on it by a motion to recommit on a roll-call vote.

If we are against the sale of implements of war in time of war, the logical thing to do is to stop it in time of peace.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. We have signed the Briand-Kellogg Pact to renounce war as an instrument of policy, except for national defense. Having done this, we have outlawed war except for national defense. Having outlawed war, it is only logical and proper that the next step should be to outlaw the sale of ammunition and implements of war. This is what I am proposing to do here, to extend the prohibition to times of peace. Otherwise we become the potential slaughterhouse of the world. We will be selling armament right up to the day nations declare war. To my mind it is actually worse to prepare these nations for war than to supply them munitions of war once they have entered into war. Once they have entered into war we cannot stop it; but before they enter into war we can stop it by not selling them ammunition and implements of war which might also be used against our own soldiers. My proposal constitutes a real neutrality policy in time of peace as well as of war and would be a far more effective step toward promoting peace than anything contained in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield; certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The amendment which the gentleman now proposes he did not propose or even suggest during the consideration of the bill by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House?

Mr. FISH. I am glad the gentleman asked that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is that true or not?

Mr. FISH. Certainly it is true, which is all the more reason we should consider it here. I did not think of this amendment before the committee. There are many other amendments I hope Members of the House will offer today to improve this legislation. We did not give any too much consideration to the details of the bill, and we received almost no help from outside in writing it.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman include munitions in addition to ammunition and implements?

Mr. FISH. No; certainly not; only arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

Mr. SIROVICH. How about munitions that could be converted into arms, ammunition, and implements of war?

Mr. FISH. No; I do not want to go that far. This is the law now as affecting belligerent nations. I want to extend it to time of peace to all nations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I did not quite catch the full import of the amendment as it was read, but, as I understood it, the amendment substitutes the few lines the gentleman offers in the amendment for the entire section?

Mr. FISH. No. If this is adopted, which I hope it will be, we will then put back practically all that section as written. I do not want to take anything out of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I simply want to understand the amendment, which I did not understand when it was read.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman stated he is sincere in including a prohibition against the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war in time of peace as well as in time of war. Is that right?

Mr. FISH. That is right.

Mr. SIROVICH. The other day during the consideration of the bill I asked the difference between ammunition and munitions and was told that munitions were raw material——

Mr. FISH. That is right.

Mr. SIROVICH. Which could be converted into arms, ammunition, and implements of war. Why not include munitions, then?

Mr. FISH. Because then you would have a total embargo; you would have a Jeffersonian embargo, and I am absolutely against that. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] should offer this amendment when he is the ranking man on the Foreign Affairs Committee and has never even suggested such an amendment prior to this time. I hardly think he hopes to get anywhere with the amendment, but that it is offered for publicity.

As you know, my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], when he wants to get something through the House, always states, "Now, this is nonpartisan", and yet the gentleman cannot make a speech on this floor without getting into partisanship before he concludes. How many on this floor from the reading of the amendment know what it is aside from the gentleman who has a copy of it? You heard him say that this is nonpartisan, and I say to you that that is what this discussion ought to be, but I challenge him now to cite any instance when he has been on this floor in favor of a bill that came out of the Foreign Affairs Committee since Franklin D. Roosevelt has been President, and although he may have supported an amendment the gentleman cannot cite an instance where he did not criticize the President before he got through with his speech.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Tell me one instance.

Mr. FISH. I shall be very pleased to tell the gentleman, because the gentleman has placed his name on all of these bills giving the President the power——

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Just tell me one instance.

Mr. FISH. Giving the President the power to determine the aggressor nation, and I have opposed every one of them.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Has not the gentleman criticized the President with respect to every bill that has come in here?

Mr. FISH. And I have been justified in doing that, because every one the gentleman has brought in has been wrong.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. This has been true ever since the gentleman has been on the Foreign Affairs Committee, and yet he always states that it is nonpartisan.

Such sentiment ought not to be considered by the committee at this time. The gentleman was on the committee and this amendment could have been considered if he had wanted it considered, and I do not think my position requires any further argument. I know this House is not going to uphold such procedure. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the subject to which I am about to address myself, to all intents and purposes, may not be a part of this bill, and before I enter into the discussion I want it understood that I have voted for every single piece of labor legislation that has come before the House since I have been a Member of the Congress; but when people desecrate the noble, real, honest labor organizations by setting up false fronts and masquerade under the guise of true labor organizations and as such enters the field of anarchy, then it is about time that the Members of this House and the people of this Nation take cognizance of the fact. [Applause.]

A situation has arisen in the great State of Michigan that is not local, but is national in its scope. Oh, the Supreme Court of the United States, in a few of its late decisions by usurpation of legislative duties, declared certain acts of Congress unconstitutional, and has laid down the law that labor and agriculture are local problems, and how far afield have they gone? Both labor and agriculture are national problems and nothing could illustrate this any stronger than the present sit-down strikes, that are in their nature nothing more or less than outright anarchy. I pray to our Lord that the President's proposal to reorganize the courts will be enacted with all haste so that we here in Washington will be able to pass legislation to cope with this serious condition which threatens the very foundation of our democratic government.

In the city of Detroit today self-constituted leaders of outlaw organizations and their sympathizers are marching by the thousands. Last Saturday, I am informed, somewhere around 20,000 of them paraded around the courthouse in the great city of Detroit and by noise stopped the action of the courts. The fair name of labor, I say, is being besmirched by those who would impose their communistic tendencies on honest labor leaders. The honest labor leaders are not in sympathy with the actions of these vandals.

I am reliably informed that the false labor leaders—these anarchists, if I must say it—who are a disgrace to real, honest labor, have gone into private business places and have confiscated the keys of such private business places, have taken charge and have put up signs, "Information booth here", and have run the owners out on the streets.

Today in Detroit I understand open warfare is carried on in defiance of organized society.

I have the highest respect for Gov. Frank Murphy, of Michigan. No man's heart beats more true to the cause of labor and the common masses than his. No man has worked harder and has been more sincere in his efforts to cope with the sinister forces of fascism and communism. He has disregarded them and has dedicated himself to the great spiritual movement known as humanism. He is attempting to restore men to their rights without bloodshed, without display of brute force, and without turning away from the course of real Americanism. You will recall the wonderful work he did in the Flint strike in behalf of labor, and now there are those of communistic tendencies—yes, anarchistic actions—who are taking advantage of his kindness, his fine attitude, to further their own selfish interests.

I understand he has made the statement—

> That neither party to any dispute can take a position in defiance of the law. The public authorities charged with the responsibility for the protection of the public are prepared to use proper means to this end.

He further stated, "All labor disputes can be adjusted peaceably through negotiations." Therefore you may rest assured that he in his fairness wants to avoid bloodshed. I abhor anything that will end in bloodshed, but I think the time has come when certain rascals who are taking advantage of this great man should be curbed, and I hope that before it is too late constituted authority will reach out with the law and take such troublemakers to a place where they will not be able to interfere with organized society. If it is not done soon, these outlaws will bring about the very thing none of us want, and that is bloodshed. Arrest these outlaw leaders and let real, honest, true Americans lead labor on to glorious victory. I love the cause of labor but will fight to the limit anyone who will besmirch it with anarchistic methods.

The Apostle Paul was keenly aware of the demands of his stewardship when he said:

> I am debtor both to the Greeks and the barbarians—both to the wise and the unwise. So as much as is in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel at Rome also.

So I, feeling keenly the love of country, the cause of labor, the duty I owe to my people, and regarding highly the oath of office I have taken to defend the Constitution of the United States, not only against enemies from without but those from within, who either by ignorance or design would wreck the principles of that sacred document and thereby bring about a collapse of our democratic form of government, I address my remarks not only to Republicans, not only to Democrats who have forgotten their promises of last fall but to all citizens of this Nation, both wise and unwise.

I wish I had time to go into the history of the development of the usurpation of the Supreme Court of the legislative duties. I have not but will do so at a later date.

There are those who blame the proposal to reorganize the judiciary for the conditions today, and some that I have just described. They are wrong. Some of the members that have molded the philosophy of the United States Supreme Court to such an extent that it is practically impossible to legally care for labor or agriculture are responsible, and the sooner that the Court is reorganized so that real American human laws will be treated as the Constitution provides—that is, to promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity—just so soon we will end all this trouble.

In my humble opinion, if the President's proposal is enacted into law now, we will have interpretations of laws within the Constitution that will free labor and agriculture from the shackles of the past and save this democracy for ourselves and our posterity.

Mr. O'CONNELL of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Michigan is proceeding out of order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed out of order.

Mr. O'CONNELL of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule debate must be confined to the bill and the pending amendment. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed in order.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, this bill or this amendment refers to arms and ammunition. They refer to the stopping of the sale of arms and ammunition, and in the city of Detroit they are using arms and ammunition today in open warfare, sir, against organized society.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNELL of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HOOK. Is the gentleman afraid to hear the truth?

Mr. COX rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, and ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. O'CONNELL of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] I wish to say that we are never going to control the shipment of munitions of war, we are never going to prevent the sale and manufacture of munitions of war, we are never going to prevent the men of greed from making millions from the blood of the people of this world through the sale of munitions of war, or prevent them from drawing our country into foreign conflicts until this Government manufactures its own munitions and takes this business out of private hands. [Applause.]

So long as you leave in the hands of private enterprise the right to manufacture everything from armor plate to cartridges, from flying machines to bayonets, you are going to have those greedy interests who, as I say, make millions at the sacrifices of civilization, stirring up wars throughout the world.

A day or two ago the French Republic, realizing the danger of being drawn into foreign conflicts by their own selfish interests in their own country, nationalized the manufactures of munitions of war of all kinds.

If America would keep out of war, we must take this power of the manufacture and sale of munitions of war out of the hands of private enterprise, and until we do that we are likely, at any time, to be dragged into conflicts with foreign countries by the propaganda of those selfish interests who made their billions out of the last war.

There are two things necessary, in my opinion, to maintain the peace of America. One of them is that we should be properly defended. In order to be properly defended we must do one of two things. We must either make our air force an independent department of the Government or else we must put the Army and the Navy and the air force under one head. So long as our air force is hampered by the static attitude of old superannuated Army and Navy officers we are never going to be properly defended.

I said yesterday I should rather have one of these young men that I hear leave this Capital at night to fly a thousand miles through rain and storm, through heat and cold, defend my country in time of war than a dozen old superannuated Army officers, ground officers, who know nothing about flying, trying to run our air force.

So far as I am individually concerned, I should rather have Amelia Earhart Putnam defend my country than to have half a dozen old superannuated, long-spurred Army officers—who helped to destroy General Mitchell—who have never been off the ground, who are trying to control our air force, attempt to defend it.

We must make our air force independent of the Army and the Navy, of this old group that controls both of these institutions, and have an independent air force, or we must put them all under one head, so that they may be directed by the heads of different bureaus so as to give us a real up-to-date air department.

Then, if we are to perpetuate the peace of the world, we must take out of the hands of the private manufacturers the right to coin their millions from the blood and tears of the suffering people of the world through the manufacture and sale of munitions of war. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All debate upon the pending amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Fish amendment, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 19, line 9, after the abbreviation "Sec. 3 (a)", strike out all of page 19, and on page 20 down through line 8. On line 9 change "(d)" to "(b", strike out all of paragraph "(e)" and insert the following, so as to read:

"SEC. 3 (a). It shall be unlawful to export or attempt to export or cause to be exported arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States in peace or war."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were—ayes 74, noes 101.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GIFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, most of us have been very patient in considering the arguments made by members of the committee. Some of us are extremely doubtful how we should vote on the final draft of this legislation. A little phrase has been running through my mind this morning like this: "Silence is sometimes golden; at other times it is just simply plain yellow."

The possible results of this legislation forced this upon my attention. As I have before said, however, in the absence of anything more courageous or more mandatory in character, taking the view of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON], we may feel it the wiser plan to vote affirmatively. But I do not want my country to be plain yellow. Nevertheless, I may climb this tree with you to get away from a forest fire, as I have before stated.

Lest I be considered out of order, my remarks will be largely based on the discretion given to the President. Whenever the administration in power has to conduct the Nation's affairs, criticisms from the other side naturally would be forthcoming. Through this entire bill there is whenever the President has issued "this" or determined "that", and, of course, there may be politics, so-called, in the criticism of giving the President of the United States discretion in making these highly important decisions. I presume these decisions must be left to somebody, and he is the only President I have got. Much as I am fearful about his hasty decisions and his lack of willingness to make decisions when anarchy is in our own country and on our own doorstep, we may be forced to clothe him with the power contained in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not yield. I only have 5 minutes. If it had not been for the courageous statements in another body on yesterday, I might have felt that the Congress itself would remain silent in this present hour of domestic peril. But some courageous Members have at last, of their own volition, not waiting for the President, expressed their views with force and clearness. It can be assumed that they have delayed expression waiting for some courageous act of the administration. However, all through this entire bill you are leaving much discretion to the President. We have much reason to be fearful of his future decisions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Did I understand the gentleman by his observation and criticism of the President to desire the return of Mr. Hoover?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh! Did I criticize the President?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No.

Mr. GIFFORD. No. I will give your President credit for all good intentions in the world, but read the Saturday Evening Post of latest issue, reminding us that hell is paved with good intentions, and if war should come from his good intentions, I do not want to see hell paved with his good intentions, do I? Or do you? Good intentions have nothing to do with it. It is results that must be considered in this bill when granting such powers.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. Does not the gentleman know when he criticizes the President——

Mr. GIFFORD. Did I criticize the President?

Mr. HOOK. That the Supreme Court has said these labor problems are local problems?

Mr. GIFFORD. In speaking of the President and my criticism possibly, my fearfulness may be justified, when a President will attempt to arouse the country against the judiciary, and attempt to destroy the faith of our people in that great and last bulwark of our liberties.

I am indeed fearful of the views of the President and of his constantly changing views, and I should be excused for mildly criticizing the great discretion granted him in this proposed resolution. Pending decision of amendments to be offered I am still doubtful as to how I should vote in its final form.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KOPPLEMANN: Page 20, line 4, strike out the word "or", and on line 5, after the words "of war", insert "or materials of war"; and add, after the word "war", on line 10, the words "and materials of war."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. This section does not deal with materials of war. The amendment is not in order at this place in the bill. It is not germane to the bill at this point. In the next section it will be germane. The next section deals with materials of war. This section only deals with the exporting of arms and implements of war.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The Chair is inclined to agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that the amendment would be germane if offered to section 4, but it is not germane to section 3. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] after section 4 has been read.

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BERNARD: Page 19, line 22, strike out all of subsection (c).

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Chairman, this section reads that "when the President shall find a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state and that such armed conflict is of such magnitude", and so on.

This section applies very clearly. We have a very vivid and tragic example of what this section would do today in Spain. The people of Spain today, under a democratic government for the first time in its history, are being attacked by the forces of fascism. No one in the world dares deny that. We have ample proof that the forces of Hitler and Mussolini are actively engaged against the Spanish democratic government.

We have placed an embargo on Spain; an arms embargo against a friendly democratic country, while at the same time we shut our eyes to the fact that the forces of fascism, under Mussolini and Hitler, are doing their level best to rape the democracy of Spain. We are faced today, Mr. Chairman, with a situation of great importance, and we must give due consideration to this proposal, because this clause will of necessity place an embargo on any other democratic nation which may be faced with a similar situation.

If we are to prevent fascism; if we are to prevent that terrible instrumentality used and engendered by the ruthless and dying capitalistic systems of Italy and Germany, where the laboring masses have been exploited and all civil liberties have been thwarted, then let us at least be frank in our purpose and adopt, if we will, a policy of giving aid to the imperialistic designs of Italy and Germany.

Why was fascism adopted in Italy and Germany? Because the working class of these countries awakened, and the tories fearing loss of wealth and power singled out ruthless demagogues and directed them to mercilessly beat the masses into submission. That is exactly what happened in Italy and Germany; that is exactly what Franco has been directed to do in Spain today.

When the great bulk of the Spanish people were illiterate and living under a feudal state no one objected, no one came to their rescue, but when the people of Spain finally opened their eyes and had the audacity, the temerity to establish a government of their own, then the enemies of the working class came to the rescue of the money lords, those who had been in control of the Spanish Government before.

In this view, Mr. Chairman, I am not alone. Permit me to read an excerpt from the bulletin of the Methodist Federation for Social Service, the issue for March 1937:

We want a world organized around the democratic way of life. The Fascist are determined to destroy that of life and to do it by merciless warfare. The only chance of stopping them without fighting is to prevent any economic aid from this country for their war plans and activities and to enable the victims of their attack to get aid here in such ways as will not draw us into conflict. The proposal to include civil strife in the neutrality bill invites the Fascist powers to do elsewhere, perhaps on this continent, what they have done in Spain.

Other great churchmen in this country are of the same opinion, as the Reverend Edgar DeWitt Jones, who is the president of the Federal Council of Churches. This is not a lone voice, Mr. Chairman. Most of us have been sent to this body to serve our constituents. We have in our own great America those who have been cheated, fooled, and exploited; and the forces of fascism are at work in this country the same as they are throughout Europe. The forces of fascism in America today are the du Ponts, the Morgans, and those who during the last campaign so bitterly attacked the Democratic administration. Are we as servants of our constituents going to betray the mandate of our people? I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that this country is facing a grave danger, because fascism is threatening the very foundation of all democracies and unless we wake up and have the courage to be fair in our international dealings and do that which is right for our people we may regret our action of today. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BERNARD]. It is an appeal from a vote which was had in this House on January 6, 1937, upon the first resolution that was passed at this session of Congress convened, Public Resolution No. 1. On a roll call every Member of the House voted for it except the gentleman who has just spoken, the vote being 406 ayes and 1 nay. He voted against it. That resolution prohibited the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to Spain, specifically naming that country.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BERNARD] objects today to the bill under consideration for the reason that he thinks it is legislation inclined to help one of the factions in the Spanish contest. It was not so intended and it will not so do. This provision simply adds to the temporary neutrality law which we now have by also providing that it shall apply when there is a state of civil strife existing in a foreign country which is of such magnitude or which is carried on under such circumstances that it may involve the peace of the United States, that the same law that prohibits the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent nations shall also be applied against the factions in this civil strife.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's speech is not one that I would call neutral; it is a speech which espouses the cause of one of the belligerents engaged in the war in Spain.

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will be as kind to the gentleman as he was to me; I will not.

Mr. Chairman, the war that is going on in Spain has illustrated the necessity for this legislation. When we passed the temporary neutrality law we did not realize that any civil war might assume such magnitude that it would be necessary for us to prohibit the exportation of arms, but the warfare going on in Spain has now reached that proportion where it is not local, where it is not national, but where it is international. The nations of the earth are involved and the peace of the world is threatened by that warfare. By the passage of this resolution we do not say that we think that those who are loyal to the Spanish Government are right or that those who are opposing the Government are right. We say to both factions, as we say in this bill with reference to all belligerent nations, that we will not ship arms, ammunition, or implements of war to either faction.

The gentleman from Minnesota and those whom he represents are unfortunate in trying to maintain neutrality by such speeches, because they fan the fires of prejudice and hatred between the factions. As far as I am concerned, I am not in sympathy with either fascism or communism, and I intend to be neutral in all foreign wars. First of all, I love my own country and I want to keep it out of the conflict of other wars. This is the motive that has actuated us in bringing in this legislation. We want to be neutral in mind, in body, and in law. I think, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is necessary as a part of our law, because the condition in Spain has developed the necessity for legislation to deal with a state of civil strife that has assumed that magnitude, not because we want to help one side or the other but because we want to keep our hands off and help neither.

This amendment ought to be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, judging by what has been said during this debate I feel confident that there is no one who wants war. We all want peace. But are we not wandering around in a fairyland of misconception? Are we not attempting to deal with a very concrete problem in the dreamy method of chasing after a pot of gold at the foot of a rainbow?

It seems that some have a misconception of the effectiveness of international law as a law of war and of the principle of freedom of the seas. This debate has brought out the fact that when a strong militarized nation is fighting for its very life, international law is but a scrap of paper and means nothing. It has further shown that freedom of the seas is but a myth when maritime powers are at a death grip. We have been proclaiming this doctrine of freedom of the seas for 144 years without being able to get the naval powers of the world to accept it. We fought the War of 1812 to defend this principle, but when the war was ended we got a peace treaty that did not even mention the principles for which we had fought. In 1917 we joined in another war, partially in defense of the freedom of the seas. We joined a group of nations who had abnegated every component part of the doctrine of freedom of the seas to fight against an enemy who was equally opposed to that doctrine.

Dream all you want to of the pot of gold that lies beyond the war zone, but do not place us in a position where we must again go through the horrors of another great war in the pursuit of war profits. No amount of war trade can ever repay us for the tremendous loss we sustained. Sure, the doors of trade were wide open. Our exports were greater than they had ever been. We made profits unheard of before. We made new millionaires by leaps and bounds. We were reveling in wealth. We owned over half the gold in the world, and we became the richest nation on earth. We were worshipping at the shrine of the "Golden Calf." But there was no blessing in those ill-gotten gains. It was blood money garnered in the game by the merchants of death. The mad dance was merry as long as it lasted. But oh, the awakening after the delerium tremens came to an end! What a headache there was the morning after the night before. But like the drunkard who again craves a drink the next morning, we want to leave the door of war profits open so that we may again participate in war trade when the next opportunity comes.

Two thousand years ago our Savior raised the question, "What profiteth a man if he gain the whole world, yet lose his own soul?" But was not our conscience eased by the thought that we had done "our bit" to put an end to war in the world for evermore? Oh, the irony of it all! Like the Raven of Edgar Allan Poe, may it be said of war profits:

Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door.
Quoth the Raven, "Never, never more."

Do we realize what the World War cost us? The World War will have cost us, by the time the last veteran is pensioned, hospitalized, and buried, $100,000,000,000. It has cost us in lives 126,000 of our finest young men. It has been the main contributary cause of our depression. It has saddled on the backs of the American people a debt of over $34,000,000,000. This debt entails an annual interest cost of over $1,000,000,000. It has been the main contributary factor in unbalancing our Budget, which was $1,000,000,000 per annum prior the World War and which has now reached the staggering sum of over $8,000,000,000 per annum.

In addition to these vast monetary losses it has lowered the spiritual and moral standards of our Nation. The deplorable crime condition of today is in part an aftermath of the war. Competent authorities estimate the annual crime bill of the United States to exceed $12,000,000,000. In addition to all this we have incurred the enmity and hate of those whom we tried to save. We are called "the shylock", as Kipling says in his Hymn of Hate:

> At the eleventh hour he came,
> But his wages were the same
> As ours, who all day long had trod
> The winepress of the wrath of God.
> Since his back had felt no load,
> Virtue in him still abode.
> So he swiftly made his own
> Those lost spoils he had not won.

My friends, never, never more must we be misled by the mirage of war profits. Never, never more must we lend our ears to the siren song of the emissaries from abroad to join them in the dance of death. We can do only one thing in legislation to keep our country out of wars, and that is prevent any unnecessary involvements with those countries at war. The only way this can be done is to keep our people from being killed at sea and keep our goods from being sunk or seized by belligerent nations. May this measure be so amended as to achieve this purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps no subject in this Congress is being watched with more interest than that of neutrality. As a nation, we want to be at peace with the world, and the efforts that have been made by our own country in the past to keep us out of war, I am sure, will meet with the approval of any fair-minded man or woman anywhere. There seems to be an idea prevalent throughout the Nation that by the passage of neutrality legislation we can keep out of war. I do not believe it is possible for the Congress to pass any legislation that will accomplish this, but we can enact into law legislation that will contribute to peace by preventing all shipments of war materials and control the conduct of our people with certain limitations that will greatly aid us in this objective. I want to compliment the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the fine bill they are presenting to the House for consideration, and to say that it is my purpose to support the bill because I believe it to be sound and that it will contribute to peace, even though it may not do all we desire.

As I understand this bill, whenever the President issues a proclamation that a state of war exists between two nations, this bill provides that thereafter it shall be unlawful to export or attempt to export or cause to be exported arms, ammunition, or any other implements of war to any belligerent country or to any neutral country for transshipment to a nation at war; but, of course, Mr. Chairman, we have a law like this at the present time, but it will expire on May 1, and what we are attempting to do now in this bill is to have a permanent law on the statute books of the United States. There has been an addition made, however, to the existing law which covers civil strife whenever such civil strife reaches a point where it might be called warfare, and whenever the President has to issue another proclamation showing that our neutrality is involved, in order to save the lives in commerce of the United States. The bill also provides that the President, by proclamation, shall state definitely the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which are prohibitive. Under the provisions of this bill—if its provisions are enacted into law—they can come here and buy articles from us, but they must pay for them immediately. In other words, the ownership must immediately be transferred to the consignee. We might not have been involved in the last war had this been done, but it will be remembered that American citizens retained ownership of commodities they sold belligerents until they were delivered at the point of destination—hence American citizens were deprived of their rights and had their property destroyed, which finally led us into the World War. It is rather difficult to look to the future and undertake to tell what kind of a war may arise, or what may be necessary to keep us out of war, but I do believe that America should not abandon its rights to the freedom of the seas; and, if I understand this bill correctly, Mr. Chairman, it does permit us to do business with belligerents so long as it is not in the war zone or area. For example, if Great Britain were to go to war with some other nation, under the provisions of this bill, it would not prevent us from doing business with Canada, and it seems to me that there is nothing wrong with a provision that permits us to do this. We certainly dare not destroy our shipping interests when there is no necessity for it, and especially when the war zone is in another part of the world. There are some limitations, however, which are left to the discretion of the President.

I believe that the history of the United States will prove conclusively that our Presidents of the past have been peace-minded just as much as the Congress, and inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States provides that this power shall be delegated to the President, I can see no force to the argument that this is a surrender of the power of Congress. In another section of the bill the President is given discretion in naming commodities; I think this is a wise thing to do, because all commodities might not be considered contraband, but whenever they were declared to be contraband the President would likely name every commodity contraband that an American vessel could not carry aboard. The United States trades with practically all of the world, and we certainly do not want to sacrifice our world trade by passing legislation that would drive trade away from us. So I think this is a wise provision in the bill that does not prevent us from doing business with the balance of the world, even though those nations be at war, so long as we can maintain our neutrality. We certainly do not want to deny to our people the right to visit Canada in the event England might be at war with some other nation, because the records will show that we have many thousands of people in the United States who have homes in Canada, have business interests in Canada, and what is true of Canada is likewise true in many other parts of the world.

I am in entire accord, Mr. Chairman, with the provision that prohibits making loans or extending any credit to Governments that are engaged in war, and I think this is a very wise provision. If we are to remain a neutral people, it is wise that we keep our people as neutral as possible, and that, of course, is the objective we are seeking in this legislation. It is perfectly obvious that no matter where war starts you will find people in our own country taking sides, and for this reason I am in accord with the provision that makes it illegal to solicit contributions to be handed to certain favored groups unless these contributions are for humanitarian purposes.

In section 6 of the bill we deal with American vessels carrying arms, which is prohibited, and is a law at the present time.

In section 7 it refers to the use of American ports as a base of supply, which is also an existing law.

In writing legislation of this sort, Mr. Chairman, we must consider all of our nationals. We have a great many American citizens who live on the various islands of the sea, and unless we would have the provision that permits them to get off those islands they would be marooned there unless the President can prescribe that they can leave on other vessels than those flying the American flag. This may not be a perfect bill, but, as I indicated before, I do not believe that any neutrality legislation can be written that will guarantee to the American people the full measure of peace that we so anxiously seek, but I do think that this is a step in the right direction, and I sincerely trust that the bill will meet with the approval of the great mass of American people. I am sure that it is an honest effort to stay out of war. Our people will never agree that we become isolationists and separate ourselves entirely from the balance of the world, and in this measure we certainly do not surrender all of our rights guaranteed to us under international law. I hope that the day may never come that this fair land of ours must again send its manhood and womanhood to war, because I have observed that war never settles anything, but in its stead it brings intense suffering and sorrow to countless thousands of men, women, and children. I also believe, Mr. Chairman, that the greatest safeguard we have for peace is adequate preparation, so that the balance of the world may know that while we are a peace-loving people, we shall never surrender our rights as citizens of the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BERNARD].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I am down in the well of the House in defense of my good friend the gentleman from Minnesota. The gentleman from Minnesota is acting only as spokesman for that group numbering in the hundreds of thousands of liberals in the United States who feel that the pending McReynolds bill and the provision in it aimed at civil war is directed primarily at the civil war in Spain, and is in effect and should be construed, by implication at least, as an act in alliance with the Fascist forces who are attempting to tear down the independent government of Spain.

In order that I may explain to the Members of the House that the gentleman from Minnesota is not without support in his contention, I would remind you that the Methodist Federation for Social Service; Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America; the United Christian Council for Democracy; the Nation; the New Republic; American League Against War and Fascism; the Witness, the latter being the official publication of the Episcopal Church; the New York Post; the Philadelphia Daily Record; ex-Congressman Vito Marcantonio; Prof. Paul H. Douglas; John Dewey; Mrs. Lorado Taft; Albert Einstein, the great German scientist; Robert Morss Lovett; Bishop Francis J. McConnell, of the Methodist Church; Bishop Robert L. Paddock, of the Episcopal Church; Devere Allen; and the historian, who some regard as America's greatest historian, Henry Elmer Barnes; Alfred Bingham; Heywood Broun, America's greatest columnist; Sherwood Eddy, international secretary of the Y. M. C. A.; Rabbi Stephen Wise, foremost of the Jewish rabbis of America—all of these and countless more are behind the gentleman from Minnesota in his demand of this House that the section in reference to civil war be deleted.

If any Member of the House is laboring under the delusion that the gentleman from Minnesota has no support, and is, in fact, unsupported by countless thousands in this country who are asking a fair deal for the civil war strugglers in Spain or the civil war fighters anywhere, he is sadly mistaken.

I could read on and on organization after organization which has requested the gentleman from Minnesota and myself to take a stand in this House in reference to this legislation so that the United States Government, for the first time in history, will not put a provision in a bill preventing humanitarian aid in the way of furnishing food, clothing, and medical aid to a friendly democratic government fighting against the invasion of fascism.

Turn around and look at the picture of Marquis de Lafayette. For what is he famed in the United States? He helped this country in a civil war when the American constitutional founders were fighting to establish a republic in the United States. It was the help of such men as the Marquis de Lafayette, Kosciusko, Baron von Steuben, the Count de Grasse, Count d'Estange, the French admirals, that made possible independence in the United States. Are we going to take a stand that will be construed by liberals throughout the entire world as an act friendly only to the Fascist forces? Are we going to say we will stand aside and permit the forces of dictatorship Italy and dictatorship Germany to enter Spain and tear it asunder? If we are going to allow that to continue, how long will it be before all of the democracies in the civilized world will find themselves confronted by these invaders?

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Washington feels so strongly about this matter, why did he not vote against the embargo on arms to Spain 2 months ago when the gentleman had a chance to do so?

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. There were a great many of us who voted one way on that resolution, laboring under a misapprehension as to the purpose for which the resolution was sought. There were a great many of us who would have voted the other way had we understood fully the provisions. Also, we were assured by the chairman of the committee there would shortly be a neutrality bill which would take care of the situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose this bill will pass by a heavy vote in the House of Representatives. I make no concealment of the fact I await its passage with a sinking heart. It may be that mine is a voice crying in the wilderness, but such as it is, I ask the indulgence of the Committee for but a moment while I utter a sentiment or two with respect to the implications of this bill.

I agree with an estimate of it which I understand was given in the Senate by Senators BORAH and JOHNSON, and with estimates of it given in part, at least, upon the floor here yesterday by more than one Member.

To me it means the surrender of an ancient and precious tradition, the sacrifice of an ideal. True, it is costly at times to live up to great traditions, costly sometimes, terribly costly, to live up to a great ideal. But that we should determine in advance of the event that we shall not live up to our ideals, that we shall not attempt to preserve our traditions, is to me a sad thing.

The struggle for liberty has been going on in this poor old world for centuries. Liberty is a thing of the spirit. It fills the hearts and souls of men with a strength and eagerness far surpassing the influence of material things. Human beings have been struggling for centuries to achieve it and have been struggling for centuries to hold it when achieved. As we look across the world today it is apparent that in many great areas the struggle will have to commence all over again.

This country has worshiped the ideal of liberty. We have achieved it. If we are viligent we will preserve it for our children. We did not achieve it without assistance. We achieved it with the assistance of those who were imbued with the same ideals of liberty. The gentleman from Washington who preceded me pointed to the portrait of the Marquis d'Lafayette as an example of this ideal.

What does this bill propose? It proposes in effect that no matter whether some little struggling people, ground down and oppressed by a mightier power, shall raise the cry for help it is decided in advance, to all practical intents and purposes, that America smugly shall say, "We are not interested."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Minnesota is right in what he said yesterday, that this bill offers an open invitation to the great aggressors the world over. Present-day aggressors and potential aggressors smile cynically when they see this bill go through. They are armed to the teeth. They have material resources which will sustain them in their conquests. It is the little fellow who will be dismayed when he sees what this bill means to him, for under it he is cut off, he is told he may not even purchase a weapon with which to defend his liberty or to achieve it. He is told in advance that America is not interested. It is an amazing prospect.

Under this cash-and-carry program, what will be the situation? It is that America announces to the world that she is willing to do business with the strong, with nations strong enough to send their merchantmen to our coasts and protect them while they are here and while they are loading the goods which we sell them. The necessary implication is that while the strong are doing that, and we are doing business with the strong, the strong will see to it we do not do business with the weak.

In other words, America decides by the passage of legislation of this kind never again to give encouragement to struggling little peoples, and decides that if the strong are strong enough she will do business with them. We are doing a disservice to liberty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot yield.

I am not casting aspersions upon the motives, much less the intelligence, of my colleagues, but this bill is going to pass because we are in a state of hysteria. That I believe to be the case. But, be that as it may, I view its passage with a sinking heart. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have a very high regard, as well as great admiration, for the ability of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who has just addressed the committee. I was hopeful, however, I might ask him a question so that I might know his position in this matter, but I gathered from his remarks that he belongs to that school of thought that believes we should pass no neutrality legislation. I will ask the gentleman if he will answer that question so I may know his position?

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is the gentleman opposed to all of this legislation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would not go further than the present law and I would only extend that for 1 year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understood the gentleman to attack the present law with respect to shipment of arms.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The principle underlying the present law is made a permanent policy. I would not let it go more than 1 year, and I would confine it to the present law. To write it down in permanent statute is the thing I dread.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If it is wrong in principle, why extend it for a year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps my willingness that the Government of the United States shall experiment for a short time would account for that. I have no faith in it as a permanent law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We have had this law prohibiting shipment of arms to belligerent nations for more than 2 years.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. It may be stated that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and myself, while we may have a general pair for all practical purposes on 9 out of 10 measures that come before the House because our political views differ, nevertheless, as a former Senator, as the author of the National Defense Act, and as a former chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, I have a very high regard for his views, and I think the gentleman has made a contribution to this discussion. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the attack is made here that in this bill we are surrendering something. We are in a way limiting and curtailing our rights, but this is being done for the great purpose of keeping our country from becoming involved in war. We want to say to the nations of the earth and give notice to the world that we are against war; that we are not only against it, but that we will not furnish the implements of death by which war is carried on.

Mr. Chairman, if this is right—and the gentleman states he is in favor of it for 1 year—why is it not right as a matter of permanent policy?

They talk about freedom of the seas, Mr. Chairman; but when war comes, what freedom does any country have except the freedom that it can assert by force? Freedom of the seas is a myth in time of war, and no power can assert or exercise that right unless it is armed and equipped to enforce it. International law in time of war is not international law except as one nation has the power to enforce it.

There was one statement that the gentleman made, however, I would like to take notice of. The gentleman stated that this measure is designed and intended to help the larger nations of the earth and that they will smile with complacency and pleasure at the fact it is to be passed. I think I know, Mr. Chairman, that the nations of Europe, large and small, are all against this bill. They do not want us to deny during war the sale of arms and extending of credit. In the past when war has come in foreign countries they have looked to this Nation for credit and for munitions of war. Under this bill we will no longer do either, and the refusal of the United States so to do will be a deterrent against war.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And now, Mr. Chairman, we say to them, "When you want to fight, when you want to settle your international disputes by war, we will furnish you neither munitions nor credit", and without munitions and money they cannot successfully carry on any war. The large nations and the small nations of Europe are against this legislation because we have been a harbinger in the past for credit and munitions, but we are now giving notice to the powers of the world that we are going to quit it. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer, and I object.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I, too, have great respect for the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. He did me the honor of listening as I addressed this House the other day on this bill. He must have heard my statement to the effect that since we have no recourse through the nations of the world today to get world peace, we must proceed selfishly in our desire for peace at least for America. I am glad that the gentleman from New York spoke, because he mentioned two outstanding American leaders who have opposed concurrent action by the nations of the world. He used the names of Senator JOHNSON of California and Senator BORAH. The best argument—and that is why I rise—that has been made for a world court and a get-together of the nations of the world for peace, prompted by the desire of liberty for the small nations of the world, was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I hope in the future he will be as consistent in his argument when measures come before this House or other bodies that will embody the ideal of world peace. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN: Page 19, line 22, after the word "whenever", strike out the words "the President shall find that."

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPORT OF OTHER ARTICLES AND MATERIALS

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 3 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 3, or to a state wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security and preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe, for any American vessel to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent state, or any state wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 3 of this act, or to any other state for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent states or within such state where civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate the articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels to transport.

(b) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations under section 3 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of further restrictions on exportation of commodities from the United States to the belligerents, or to any state wherein civil strife exists, is necessary to promote the security and preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives or commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe to export or transport from the United States to any belligerent state or state wherein civil strife exists named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 3 of this act, or to any other state for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent state or such state wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such articles or materials shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which they are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials.

Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or airship contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under this section to other states as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 3 of this act.

(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under this section.

(e) Any proclamation issued by the President under this section shall apply equally to all belligerents.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHANLEY: On page 23, line 12, after the period, insert "(f) Except with respect to prosecutions committed or forfeitures incurred prior to May 1, 1939, this section and all proclamations issued thereunder shall not be effective after May 1, 1939."

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, neutrality, like liberty, has been the motive of good deeds and common precept of crime since the sowing of the seed by Grotius in 1625. Those of us who have been arguing for a searching, cautious study of neutrality believe that this type of amendment, the effect of which is to bring before the House biennially the review and possible perfection of existing neutrality legislation, will be provocative of beneficial results. We must bracket ourselves between ignorant change and ignorant opposition to change. This committee has worked faithfully and honestly and sincerely. Like the committee in the other body, it has been presented with problem after problem and has analyzed every one of them, and has come to a conclusion in majority fashion that this type of bill will best effect the ends of its philosophy.

Those of us who bitterly oppose the Pittman bill naturally seek with this amendment not to frustrate the international policy of our President but to bring once more to the American people the fact that this subject is so vast, so complex—may I use the words of the Supreme Court in the Curtis decision, when they said that neutrality is "delicate, complicated, and manifold." Because of that belief and precedents that go back to Chief Justice Marshall's utterances, they gave almost irresponsible power to the Chief Executive in external affairs.

I said the other day in presenting to you the problem of reciprocal-trade treaties, that we ought to be very cautious before we adopt the automatic embargo of the Pittman bill. I believe that with this amendment we are going to correct more than one evil, but we are going to keep before the American people this great subject. When we bring it before them biennially, we give them an opportunity to correct any mistakes that have been made.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. I yield.

Mr. EATON. Are we to understand that the effect of the gentleman's amendment is to make section 4 temporary for 2 years?

Mr. SHANLEY. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman change that and make it for 1 year? We are not lazy people. We will be in session next year. Why not change it to 1 year?

Mr. SHANLEY. I thought of that. However, in the great international pattern of our President, with the reciprocal-trade treaties, with the possibility of a disarmament conference, and another tripartite currency conference, I believe that 2 years will serve his purpose and permit a better unfolding of his foreign policy.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Then would it not be better, on account of the reciprocal-trade agreements alone, to reenact the present law?

Mr. SHANLEY. Not necessarily. As I said the other day, the positing of this discretionary power in the President's hands in contradistinction to the mandates of the Pittman bill give him the opportunity to make his reciprocal-trade policy coincide with his neutrality ideas. Certainly he will not allow one to laugh at the other. At the most I used 2 years only relatively.

In the time remaining may I say that in response to many requests as to whether the present bill would permit the solicitation and reception of money for humanitarian purposes, I have the assurances of the chairman of the committee, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, that an explanatory clause will be added to section 5. I have promised several people that I would seek this clarifying amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY]. I am sorry if we get into such a condition of affairs on a neutrality bill where it becomes a contest between this side and the other side, between Democrats and Republicans. The amendment I previously offered, in a nonpartisan way, was turned into a partisan issue, and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs got up and made a political speech and did not discuss the merits of the amendment at all. I am again asking you to consider this amendment on the basis of merit. This bill, like ancient Gaul, is divided into three parts—the good, which should be kept; the bad, which should be eliminated; and the indifferent, that should be perfected.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY] tries to perfect the bad and indifferent parts of the bill, or at least to make such provisions temporary.

These experiments are untried and novel and probably dangerous, and might actually involve us in war. He wants to avoid making those permanent and instead to limit them for 2 years. I am willing to go along for either 1 year or 2 years with these experiments. If they turn out all right then we can proceed in the next Congress to make them permanent or if not, to change them.

It seems to me this is a very sound amendment and ought to be considered on its merits; and I appeal to my Republican friends, this having been offered by a Democrat, that we should consider the amendment on its merits regardless of partisanship.

My colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] made an able speech here a little while ago. I do not agree with him. He spoke in behalf of the doctrine of freedom of the seas. Everybody knows that our contention for the freedom of the seas has dragged us into every single European war in the last 150 years. He makes an appeal for liberty in small nations. What have we got to do with the form of government in any nation other than our own? What have we got to do with the form of government in Russia, in Germany, in Italy, in Great Britain, or in any of the small nations? That is not our business. The American people have decided to modify the doctrine of the freedom of the seas and propose to do it in this bill. I admit the section discriminating against American ships goes way beyond my views regarding proper concessions to our rights as a neutral on the high seas.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman be so kind as to explain the significance of his last remarks, especially remembering the statement of Woodrow Wilson that we went into the World War to make the world safe for democracy?

Mr. FISH. Woodrow Wilson made that statement, and that statement has turned out to be a farce and a mockery. We were involved in the World War because we insisted on our rights as a neutral to send our ships anywhere we wanted to send them. That is the doctrine of the freedom of the seas and that is what involved us in war; but we do not propose to be involved in any other wars fighting for the freedom of the seas, we propose to modify it in this bill and keep this country out of war. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I may state that I also approve the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, and I think the members of the committee do as well. We have given this subject quite a good deal of study. These bills have been written rather by piecemeal. The first one merely covered arms and ammunition and extended, I believe, to February 28 or March 1 of 1936. The next bill we passed on the subject included arms and ammunition and extended the policy to credits. The operation of that bill expires on May 1 of this year.

The question of commodities is a very serious one. It is rather a question what might occur in the future, and that is why we have tried to place in the bill with regard to the handling of commodities provisions giving the President proper discretion.

We hear a good deal of talk about mandatory provisions. It is my view the discretionary provisions are just as necessary to keep us out of war as any of the so-called mandatory provisions. The great need is flexibility. Inasmuch as this is an experiment, inasmuch as it is entirely different from any bill that has been introduced heretofore on this question, we feel it should apply for a period of only 2 years. By that time perhaps we can profit by the legislation and by further study.

I rise also to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am glad and delighted that the senior Republican member of my committee and myself certainly do agree on one proposition. I trust we can have a vote before he gets away from me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes in addition to the 5 allowed me under the rule on my pro-forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for 8 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, which I think immeasurably improves the bill; and I am delighted to hear the able chairman of the committee state that he accepts the amendment.

All of us recognize the great ability, the unfailing patriotism, and the good intent of the author of the pending bill, Judge McREYNOLDS, and all of us appreciate the enormous difficulty of the task he has sought faithfully to accomplish—the establishment of America's neutral position in the world—but we should give the most careful thought to the far-reaching implications of the measure he has brought before us.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] raised a question as to whether the enactment of this bill would establish a permanent Anglo-American alliance. I do not raise the question—I assert it. Furthermore, I am fortified by up-to-the-minute statistics to prove it. Only yesterday the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce completed the compilation of export statistics for the calendar year 1935. This report shows that in 1935 we exported to Germany goods valued at $91,981,000; to France, $117,013,000; to Italy, $72,415,000; to Japan, $203,283,000, while to the British Empire we exported goods valued at $973,400,000. In other words, our exports to Great Britain were more than double our exports to all of the other leading countries combined. If this bill only limited exports to normal quotas, it would not be quite so bad, but we can readily see with Britain's mastery of the seas how this bill in the future will make America the great British storehouse and source of supply of all war materials not strictly munitions of war. Surely this bill must give great cheer and encouragement to Downing Street.

Furthermore, if we want to take a long step toward the creation of a dictatorship in America and the establishment of a fascist form of government molded in the best Hitler and Mussolini style, we will pass this so-called neutrality bill, but if we want to hold true to the American traditions of democracy and preserve the principle of popular rule as the chart and compass of our national destiny, we will defeat the bill with its dangerous proposal to confer vastly increased war-making powers on the President.

Dictatorships are the prevailing fashion all around the world. Nations are going centripetal at an amazing rate and our country is no exception. In heaven's name, cannot we see in all of the present trends of governments that we are heading rapidly enough in the direction of a dictatorship in America without passing the so-called "discretionary" provisions in this bill which would be tantamount to transferring the war-making power from the Congress to the Executive?

President Roosevelt is a peace-loving President, thank the Lord. His effort to establish a concord of nations in the Western Hemisphere entitles him to the highest meed of praise. I would trust him implicitly to do everything possible to keep us out of war.

But we must remember that we are writing a permanent neutrality law today, and we must make allowance for many different kinds of Presidents in the years to come. If every future President of the United States, as provided under section 4 of the McReynolds bill, is to be allowed to slosh around in international affairs as his judgment and inclination may dictate, levying embargoes against some nations and allowing free and unrestricted trade with other nations according to his fancy, we will never have any peace and security in this country. If section 4 stays in the resolution, the title should be changed, and it should be called "a resolution to get America into war."

I have never played poker in my life, but I think I know something about the peculiarities of the intriguing game. Imagine what would happen in a group of poker players, with arsenals strapped to their hips, when the prospective winner is about to reach over to rake in the pot if the "neutral" manager of the house were to announce that the rules of the game had been changed, thus making the prospective winner the prospective loser. There would certainly be some shooting and there will be plenty of shooting in which the United States will be involved if the President, in the midst of the game of war, is allowed free rein to juggle with embargoes, because every move he would make would be bound to be unneutral toward some country engaged in the war.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 4 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I understood that all debate on this amendment expired after the gentleman from Indiana used his 8 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. On the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks all time will have expired on the pending amendment.

Mr. KVALE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that agreement may be set aside. I object to the extension of time requested by the gentleman from Indiana and ask for recognition. I have sought recognition. I have a bona fide amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has informed the gentleman from Minnesota that at the proper time the Chair will recognize him, when he offers the amendment.

Under the rules of the House all debate on the pending amendment will have expired upon the expiration of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. KVALE. Is the pending amendment an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 4 additional minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] in his speech said that the President already has power enough to get this country into war at any time. That being true—and it is true—does he not have power enough in all conscience, and why should we give him any more war power?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I cannot yield; my time is too limited.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman mentioned my name.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am sorry, but I cannot yield.

The best interests of the people of America and of posterity demand that these discretionary provisions, which comport with a dictatorship but ill become a republic, should be voted down overwhelmingly.

It is no wonder that this House of Representatives—which is still, I hope, the refuge of the people—broke into applause when the able gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], in opening this neutrality debate last Friday, said:

> Personally this right—
> The right to declare war—
> is one right of Congress I should never vote to surrender to any Executive.

In the interest of our common country and the perpetuation of our heritage of freedom, which we hope to hand down unimpaired to our children and our children's children, when we write a permanent neutrality law that is to stand for all time, we should remember our obligation to posterity. We should oppose with all our might a further centralization of the war power in America and should stand for a decentralization of that power to the people themselves. Let those who have to suffer and, if need be, to die and to bear the awful burdens and griefs of war have something to say as to whether war shall be declared. In Hitler-controlled Germany and Mussolini-controlled Italy absolute domination over the lives and happiness of the people rests with one man, whose will for war or peace cannot be challenged. We do not want to raise any of the Hitler and Mussolini breed in this country. Let us keep our soil sacred to the cause of liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado to the amendment offered by Mr. SHANLEY: Strike out the figures "1939" in the last line of the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1938."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understand there is no debate allowable on this amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may have 5 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have not attempted to secure time because of my understanding that no further debate would be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for debate has expired on the Shanley amendment. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have already expressed my views briefly on this legislation. I have stated that this was the most experimental, the most novel, and speculative legislation perhaps ever considered by an American Congress. I am referring to section 4.

The original neutrality legislation, the present law, was given a tryout for a period of just 1 year and it was not particularly experimental or speculative. It is a very simple, definite proposition to place an embargo on arms, ammunition, and war equipment, on loans and credits to foreign nations, and to keep Americans off of belligerent vessels. It is very easily appraised and administered.

Now we are entering a vast, new, exploratory field in which we cannot even conjecture what the possible results will be or in what it may involve this country. I want to repeat what I said the other day that when the time comes, as it must under this legislation, we surrender not only the freedom of the seas but the use of the seas, as well as all of our foreign trade. Bear in mind we are not merely giving up something under this legislation known by a term that is very difficult to define—freedom of the seas—we are going to give up absolutely the use of the seas by all American ships for all purposes. That is exactly what this legislation means, and in addition we will give away all of our trade with the world. This is the way it must work out in practice if we are to avoid the sinking of American ships. This was settled in the World War.

I am not so confident as some of the proponents of extreme neutrality legislation appear to be, that when this program is put into effect in war the national reaction to it will be what they hope it will be. Perhaps quite the contrary may be the case.

We have passed many important emergency bills in this Congress, a number of them much more important than this one and we have put a limitation in those bills of 1 year. We limited the original act to 1 year and I can see no reason on earth why we should not limit this legislation to 1 year. We may learn something within the next 12 months. We may be able to come back within the next 12 months and legislate differently, more informatively. There will be a Congress here a year from now, so why attempt to tie the hands of the administration for 2 years?

Mr. SHANLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SHANLEY. The gentleman from Colorado does not mean to say we cannot amend this bill next year?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Certainly not. There is no need, from that standpoint, for a 1-year or a 2-year limitation. We can leave it wholly free from limitation and come back here next year and repeal or amend it if we want to, or we can do that 3 months from now. If my amendment fails, I shall vote for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SHANLEY. I am glad to have the gentleman's statement on that.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] said, but we have given this all kinds of study. We feel the term should be 2 years, which is a reasonable time, just as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY] stated. If there is any reason to change the law next year, and if it is desired by the Congress to do so, it may be changed, but we do not want to be forced to take this matter up next year unless necessary. We feel that 2 years is the proper limitation, and I, therefore, hope the membership of the House will vote down the 1-year proposition and leave it at 2 years, which we have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado) there were—yeas 45, noes 97.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. SHANLEY: Page 20, line 19, after section 4, strike out the entire section through page 23, line 12, ending "this section shall apply equally to all belligerents" and insert "(a) whenever the President shall have issued the proclamation."

Mr. McREYNOLDS (interrupting reading of amendment). Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is offering an amendment as a substitute for the entire section. It is not germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY], which is a limitation, and is not a substitute for the amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska is not a limitation and is not germane to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is clearly not a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out section 4 (a).

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 20, line 19, strike out all of subsection (a).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, apparently there are several schools of thought to be considered in respect to neutrality legislation—those who prefer discretionary powers being given to the President; those who favor mandatory legislation by the Congress; and those who are in between, who favor neither one but believe that American shipping should carry goods and commodities at its own risk.

This section is the crux of the bill. It is short, and everybody ought to get a copy of the bill and see what paragraph (a) of section 4 does. It is the paragraph which discriminates against American shipping. It permits the President of the United States to say that certain commodities shall not be carried by American ships to belligerent nations. It gives the President discretionary power to wreck the American merchant marine. If this section is adopted, we delegate and surrender our constitutional power to lay embargoes to the President.

My proposition is simply this: Strike it all out, including the lines reading:

The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate the articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels to transport.

If that delegation of embargo power is stricken out, then we hope to insert an amendment to the effect that American ships will be considered the same as any other ships, and can carry the same commodities, except they shall do so at their own risk.

If this is done, then we protect our American merchant marine and our own shipping. If we do not do it, this is what happens:

First, we surrender—and a good many Members of Congress are getting tired of delegating away our own constitutional powers—to lay embargoes to the President, who in turn will probably delegate it to some subordinates in the State Department to legislate for us; and to legislate against whom and against what? Why, American shipping and American commerce, so neutral nations, Japan, England, and others, can come over here, take our trade, and profit by it, thus literally destroying our own merchant marine.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I am just a little puzzled to understand the gentleman's position now as compared with what it was an hour or two ago, when he favored absolute abandonment of the high seas. The gentleman now argues we are liable to destroy our commerce.

Mr. FISH. Not at all. As I stated before, I take a middle course. I am willing to modify our rights regarding the freedom of the seas. I do not think we should permit our ships, as we did in the World War, to go to belligerent nations to get us into war simply for the sake of profit and greed. I want to modify that right, and I want American ships to take our commodities on the same basis as foreign ships, but to take the commodities at their own risk.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman believe this bill leads to the abandonment of the high seas by our commerce?

Mr. FISH. Certainly a modification of it.

Mr. MAY. Yet the gentleman is going to vote for it?

Mr. FISH. I never said I would vote for it. There are many things in the resolution I do not like.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. With respect to this provision, which prohibits American ships from carrying certain commodities to belligerent nations, it is the sinking of American ships which might involve us in war and not the sinking of other ships, is it not? This is to prohibit our ships under certain conditions from carrying commodities to belligerent nations, so as to prevent our becoming involved in war.

Mr. FISH. This amendment practically destroys American shipping. If the provisions are carried out by the President and he proclaims American ships cannot carry certain commodities to belligerent nations, then we transfer such trade to England, Japan, or to the other big shipping nations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. However, the gentleman does not believe any President would exercise this power unless there were an emergency?

Mr. FISH. The very purpose of the bill under this section is to discriminate against American shipping. There is no other purpose in it. All you have to do is to read the section. If you want to give up your embargo power, if you want to say to the President and the subordinates in the State Department, "Go ahead and discriminate against American ships and give this trade to other foreign nations", then adopt this section, because that is the very purpose of it. There is no other meaning to it whatever.

We spend millions of dollars each year to build up our merchant marine. We spend hundreds of millions of dollars to build up our Navy. If this paragraph goes through, you might as well scuttle the Navy and the merchant marine or lock them up in Chesapeake Bay, and make a laughingstock of the strongest and greatest Nation in the world by saying, "We do not dare carry our own trade; we are going to turn it over to someone else."

The proposal I make is halfway between the mandatory provision, favored by those who seek the old Jeffersonian embargo to lock our ships up in our own ports, which failed over 100 years ago, and the provision favored by those who would give discretionary power to the President to discriminate against American shipping.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Our merchant marine has been subsidized. Would it not be a better proposition to subsidize our merchant marine in time of war and keep the ships within our ports?

Mr. FISH. It is not going to involve us in war if we say to our own ships that they can transport our own goods to belligerent nations at their own risk, because we serve notice on them that we are not going to war if they are sunk.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I am in favor of protection of our merchant marine. However, in time of war if we sent our ships across the sea at their own risk and they were sunk or captured, would not that inevitably involve us in war?

Mr. FISH. Certainly not; no more than the other section of the bill where we say that American nationals shall not travel on vessels of a belligerent nation except at their own risk.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to criticize unduly the gentleman's argument, but I have been trying in vain today to understand what the gentleman from New York really stands for. The gentleman says in one breath that this section does away with our merchant marine and that he is trying to preserve the doctrine of freedom of the seas for the benefit of our merchant marine. Then just a moment ago he said that belief in the doctrine of freedom of the seas has involved us in every foreign war since we became a nation. Then he said he is for peace. Now make heads or tails out of that.

We could do without the business that our merchant marine does in a year if by so doing we could keep America out of war, because, as a matter of fact, during the year 1936 the entire business of the American merchant marine was about 10,300,000 tons and was only valued at about $750,000,000. During the World War we lost about $41,000,000,000, or in other words the war cost us that amount, directly and indirectly, and yet the gentleman comes in here and preaches at one time the doctrine of preserving freedom of the seas, when we can only preserve that by going to war, because there is no appeal provided by national or international law from condemnation based upon an embargo list. If warning countries embargo our goods and establish a contraband list and they are sold in a prize court, there is no appeal except going to war and massing the young manhood of America, as well as the dollars of America, to preserve freedom of the seas. Mr. Chairman, there is no consistency in such a position.

The gentleman states he is for some kind of discretionary legislation, but his type of discretionary legislation is in no man's land, because no man can understand the extent to which he would go in the matter of discretionary legislation.

The only difference between the position of the gentleman from New York and the position of the committee on this side of the House is that the gentleman thinks that discretionary legislation should stop where the gentleman from New York says, and not where the committee provides it shall stop. The committee has made an exhaustive study of the matter and has decided otherwise.

The gentleman in his minority report made this statement about discretionary legislation, and I leave it to the members of the committee to decide whether or not he is in favor of discretionary legislation of some kind:

> Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations, as provided by section 3.

As a matter of fact, that gives discretionary power to the President, because war is never declared these days; it simply comes about and exists, and it is up to the President of the United States to say whether or not a state of war exists in the world.

The gentleman goes on a little further and states in his minority report:

> When the President has decided that question—
> And—
> he deems it necessary in order to promote the security and protect the peace and neutrality of the United States, and he shall so proclaim, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American citizen or person to in any way—

Do this, that, or the other; in other words, according to the gentleman's statement, the President of the United States should have authority to decide whether or not this or that would be inimical to the interests of the United States. So you see even the gentleman himself cannot get away from discretionary power.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I made some remarks the other day about the inconsistency of the very delightful gentleman from New York and his arguments.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question to help him there?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. My good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] stated that an American ship should be permitted to leave our harbor to go to a belligerent port at its own risk.

I call his attention to the fact there is not a merchant marine line operating from an American port that is not constructed up to 75 percent of its value by the money of the Government of the United States. They have 20 years to amortize the money that is so invested, and how would we, through the President and the Congress, ever permit a ship to leave our ports where our own money is invested and which would be sunk at our expense.

Mr. RICHARDS. I thank the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: Page 22, line 18, at the end of the paragraph, insert a new paragraph to read:
> "Any provisions herein included shall apply to communications, controls, including cable, radio, and mail dispatches, and shall give to the President full authority to amplify, restrict, or curtail such services as may to him seem required in the interest of peace or averting possible or actual hostility."

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, realizing possibly that that point of order may apply, I ask the gentleman to withhold the point of order.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I withhold the point of order.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I throw this amendment, which is hastily sketched and not so aptly phrased, into this discussion because I think the Committee has made one important omission in the consideration of the problem that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] has termed vast. It is so vast that there are few minds in this Chamber—and I do not include myself in that category—that are able to grasp the full significance of what we are doing today, but when one takes care of provisions and supplies, arms and munitions of war, and disregards communications, with the place they have taken in public life and international relations today, I say again it is an important omission in the bill of the importance of the measure that is before us today.

I ask the Members to give respectful attention to this most important corollary. Here is something that we are writing into our permanent statutes.

I have been reluctant to come to the belief that we should give discretionary power to a Chief Executive, not because I lack faith in the great man who now occupies that seat, but because some others may follow and because someone may abuse the power that we today give to our President if we pass the bill in its present form and it eventually becomes law.

I do now ask the membership of this body, and I do ask the conferees that may try to reconcile the differences between the Senate concept and the concept of this body as to what should be final law, to consider this matter of the control of communications and propaganda, radio, and correspondence, and cables in time of great emergency or in times of actual war.

The idea is not original with me. I am a diligent reader of the Philadelphia Record, because I like its frank enunciation of editorial policies and because I like its complete analysis in its financial page. This idea was born at about the time this controversy started in the mind of the editor of the Philadelphia Record, and to him I am indebted for it.

I have given it a great deal of thought since I first saw it, and I have spoken to some of the thinking members of the press and to some of the thinking citizens of my own district and of this body since that time. I think it is something that deserves our careful and close attention. I telephoned this afternoon to the librarian of that paper, and I hope to include that editorial as a part of my remarks, and I shall withhold them until such time as I receive it. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks a copy of the editorial to which I have referred.

[From the Philadelphia Record of Oct. 19, 1936]

NEWS MUST BE NEUTRAL, TOO

What are the pillars of American neutrality?

No shipment of munitions.

No credit to belligerents.

No American protection for citizens who insist on traveling in war zones.

To these add one further important factor—

The most strenuous efforts on the part of the Government to see to it that the American people are kept fully informed as to both sides of any foreign conflict.

For the same reason that there must be an embargo on goods, the State Department must make every effort to circumvent any nation which, for propaganda purposes, tries to put an embargo on European news to the United States.

During the World War the British held the European end of the trans-Atlantic cable and censored all war and diplomatic news. For that reason only the allied side of the case could be presented here and the atrocity stories faked by the Allies, as well as the soft pedal on the American dispute with the British over our neutrality rights, were powerful factors in leading this country into war with Germany.

That situation must not be allowed to arise again.

We must stand ready to accept the fact that the British shall control the sources of most American newspaper information on Europe.

Although Great Britain is not at war, it is already exercising that power to further its own propaganda interests here. The refusal to allow the Italian spokesman, Baron Pompeo Aloisi, to relay a radio address to the United States is a flagrant example of the British method.

The State Department, the Navy Department, and the Communications Commission in Washington are reported agreed that the British action was a violation of a treaty with the United States. The State Department is contemplating sending a note of protest to London.

More to the point than such a protest would be an official statement to the American people by Secretary Hull and the President, pointing out that the British have violated a treaty and warning the public to be very cautious about taking sides on the basis of what news is allowed to filter through from Europe.

The State Department should also use its embassies and legations more for the purpose of informing the American people concerning the true state of affairs abroad.

Some newspapers, such as the Record, do their best to present both sides of all foreign conflicts. But the task is difficult, especially in any case involving Britain.

British propaganda methods are so much more subtle and effective than those of any other nation, that foreign news, almost invariably, takes on a pro-British tinge.

The ties of language and the similarity, superficial at least, between our institutions and those of Great Britain form another hold which the British have upon American public opinion.

During the World War there was a little group of well-informed citizens who believed that President Wilson could have kept America out of the war simply by keeping the public informed as to the true state of our relations with Great Britain during that period.

The British systematically, flagrantly and defiantly violated American "rights" during the war, and in the opinion of many there existed at least as much basis for our going to war with Britain as for going to war with Germany.

Secretary Lansing deliberately obscured the diplomatic struggle with the British in a mist of legal verbiage, although the causes of conflict were very real.

At present we must pursue exactly the opposite course. The public must be kept informed of every international move affecting the United States.

It is folly to expect that the British will not establish a censorship over news cables in event of another war.

It is up to the American State Department to see to it that such a censorship does not accomplish its object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states to the gentleman from Minnesota that the gentleman will have to get that permission when we get back into the House. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. For what reason?

Mr. KLOEB. For the reason that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota is not germane to section 4. Section 4 deals entirely with the export of articles and materials other than actual munitions of war. The gentleman's proposed amendment deals with communications, radio and otherwise, and, therefore, is not germane to the section to which it is sought to be applied.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 4, subsection (b), deals with the exportation of commodities. As stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KLOEB] this amendment includes communications, cables, radio, and mail dispatches, and it is certainly not germane to section 4 of the bill. For that reason the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FERGUSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, let us see if we cannot come to an agreement in respect to time for debate upon this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. FISH. I would suggest not less than half an hour.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska and Mr. KOPPLEMANN reserved the right to object.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McREYNOLDS) there were ayes 82 and noes 61.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KVALE. Will the Chair advise me if the amendment which I offered, and which was ruled out of order, will be in order if offered as a separate section at the proper time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, cannot pass upon that until it has actually been offered by the gentleman. At the proper time, if it is offered, the Chair will attempt to rule on it.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Earlier in the afternoon I submitted an amendment, and the Chair ruled it out of order under the section where it was offered, but stated it would be in order under the next section. My purpose in asking the question now is, will I be recognized to offer the amendment, in view of the vote that has just been taken to shut off, unfairly, proper amendments that the American people want voted upon in this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the gentleman from Connecticut propounded a proper parliamentary inquiry, but in order to satisfy the gentleman, if the Chair is permitted, he intends to recognize the gentleman from Connecticut.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] is recognized.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERGUSON: Page 20, line 18, strike out all of section 4.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. It is my understanding that the gentleman from New York offered that same amendment, and it was voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offered an amendment to strike out section 4 (a). That has been disposed of.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, we have had a great deal of discussion today about the effect of this bill in time of war. I would like to call the attention of the membership to the possible effect of this section which ties up our merchant marine and puts an embargo on our foreign trade except on a cash-and-carry basis, in time of peace, to the effect it can have immediately.

You Members here who represent wheat and cotton sections of the country must certainly realize that the prices of those commodities are based on future conditions. They are sold on future deliveries, and under the basis of this section of the bill, no country in the world is going to continue to come to this Nation for those products or any other products if she can get them from any other source. What nation would continue to trade with us? Trade is interchange of products. We cannot make this a one-sided proposition. You cannot say the values of our imports and exports are such and such, and that amount of money does not make any difference in the national picture, but just consider rubber, this one product only, which amounts to some $350,000,000 annually, which might be considered unimportant in dollars; what if the importation of that product were shut off and all the big manufacturing industries in the automobile centers were cut off? It is not dollars and cents alone. We must maintain our trade. If this section is cut out, it would return the bill to its original status of last year. If we do not vote to take this section out of the bill today, we give our world trade, which the Democratic Party under the leadership of Secretary Hull, has tried to bring back, the worst black eye since this House passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill in 1930.

If you do not think the State Department is aware of this situation, I would like to read the testimony of Mr. Hackworth, legal adviser of the State Department, before the committee:

Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear to the committee that the State Department is not advocating any particular bill. We are not advocating any particular legislation, and I would not want that impression to get out, but we do feel that it would be a mistake to put an embargo on a large number of commodities and have stagnation of our trade here in this country that would give rise to a great many difficulties.

That is the State Department. In another instance Mr. Hackworth made this statement:

If we are going to include commodities at all, I think the suggestion of the chairman that you provide for passing of title would be far the better method of procedure.

"If you are going to include them at all." He infers that he wishes they were not included at all. Here is the Assistant Secretary of State before the Senate committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I regret to object, but the time has been limited. If the time will be extended to 35 minutes, I would not object, but the time has been limited.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, may I have unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Assistant Secretary of State pointed out that the trade in our products, such as cotton, would be channeled to other countries. Again I want to call attention to the statement of the chairman of the committee when he said:

If I had my way, I would exempt foodstuffs and clothing.

Then he goes on to say:

I hope the President will never put them in there; but under the Pittman bill they will all be in there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us strike out section 4 and save our trade, our commodity market, and last, but not least, our honor, and not put ourselves on record as saying we are going to trade with Japan and England alone, who control the seas, and the rest of the world can go elsewhere for their products. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. Chairman, I shall take only 4 minutes, in order to consume no more time than necessary.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman offers an amendment which would serve to strike out sections 4 (a) and (b) of the bill as offered by the House. By striking out section 4 (a) he would accomplish what the gentleman from New York a few moments ago unsuccessfully sought to accomplish, the elimination of subsection 4 (a). Subsection (a) gives to the President the discretion to limit the use of American ships in belligerent waters, or to restrict their use entirely if the peace, safety, and neutral position of the United States are endangered.

Section 4 (b) would require, in the wisdom of the Executive, if the peace and safety of the United States were endangered, the transfer of title to all goods and materials other than munitions of war that might be shipped from the shores of the United States.

I say to my friend, the gentleman from Oklahoma, that it has been my position from the beginning, as I stated in a rather lengthy speech a few days ago, that personally I would be satisfied with the permanent reenactment of the present law prohibiting the export of munitions of war, the making of loans and credits, and permitting the travel of American citizens on belligerent ships only at their own risk; but I recognize the fact that there is a great popular demand to attack this problem of American ships going into belligerent waters in wartime, and if we are to attack it at all, I say that we have evolved here perhaps the surest method of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion that could be evolved. Certainly, if we followed the provisions of the so-called Pittman bill, as enacted by another body, and sent to this House, making these provisions mandatory and automatic upon the outbreak of any little war on any part of the globe, certainly by so doing we would injure the shipping of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLOEB. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this section has already been limited to 2 years by the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. KLOEB. These provisions have now by amendment in this body been limited to a period of 2 years, and, therefore, I sincerely ask that the House vote down the proposed amendment.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLOEB. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. If I do not misinterpret the gentleman, my amendment striking out section 4 would make the bill conform to his personal desires.

Mr. KLOEB. No. It would have satisfied me in the beginning, but I am wholeheartedly for section 4 now with the 2-year limitation, because I believe, and wish to impress this upon my friends and the Members of this House, that it is wholesome and proper that certainly within the next 2 years this House again take up this question and discuss these neutrality problems in the interest of the peace and safety of the United States. I do not believe we should foreclose discussion or virtually foreclose it by making these provisions permanent. It is well that we keep our minds open, that we test carefully these important steps that we are taking, and that your committee in the House and this body, acting under the direction of its committee, carefully take on these great problems. They should be opened to discussion again, certainly within a period of the next 2 years.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KLOEB. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. In my estimation the gentleman from Ohio is one of the best-informed Members of the House.

Mr. KLOEB. I thank my friend.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish he had stood by his original convictions on this bill and not been influenced by the wave of popular opinion.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, having stated my position, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I heartily endorse the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma. I have stated before my position on so-called neutrality legislation. On Tuesday last, the 16th, in general debate, I said the measure that I believe would be the greatest protection to this country is the reenactment of the present so-called neutrality law.

So far as I can tell, no one is really anxious to pass this legislation. Apparently the President does not ask for its passage. Apparently the State Department does not ask for its passage. Surely our fine Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, cannot want its passage, as, if this section remains in the bill, the reciprocal-trade agreements with belligerent countries will be but scraps of paper and gone with the first breath of war; and he has repeatedly stated in effect that the greatest aid to peace is a free flow of trade among countries.

Mr. Chairman, neutrality is the most important subject the Congress has considered thus far. It has been considered, with one or two minor exceptions, in a nonpartisan way, as it should be, in an American way. This has been proved by the action of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], in accepting the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, which improves the bill by limiting its operation to 2 years. I maintain, however, that during that time this country could easily be embroiled in war as a result of this section. Looking back over the years that have intervened since the World War, every Member will remember that we were in that war less than 2 years. Thus, within the 2 years of the life of this bill, it would be possible to engage in and complete a great world war.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, its adoption would mean that there would go out of the bill that provision which spells the only difference between the law as it stands now and the bill before the House.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. As I understand, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. DONDERO. In other words, we would still have the old neutrality law that is on the books, but which expires on the 1st of May.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I cannot yield further.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KLOEB] has stated there is a great public demand that shipping on the high seas be controlled during war. I find that there is a great public demand for peace. The debate on the floor of the House proves that we are all groping in the dark, but that we are all, each and everyone of us, striving to find the right way, if that be possible, to maintain peace, to keep this country at peace.

But we all know from press reports of conditions existing in our own country and conditions existing across the sea that everyone in this country, as well as across the sea, is in a supersensitive state. If the President of the United States should change the rules of the game after the game has started, or after the war has started, it would undoubtedly be considered an unneutral act by one nation or the other; there would be reprisals and we would be at war. Let us stay steadily in session, if it be necessary, to enact proper legislation.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. When the eminent chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in statesmanlike fashion, took the floor he offered a motion restricting all debate on this section to 30 minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is the gentleman making a speech about me?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I am offering a parliamentary inquiry. He moved that all debate on this section be concluded in 30 minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not stating a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. If the gentleman will give me a chance, I will state it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule at the end of the gentleman's statement of the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is the Chairman going to listen to a speech?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants to hear what the parliamentary inquiry involves.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The 30 minutes was intended for the benefit of the House. Almost from the time that that motion was agreed to by the House the members of the committee, one after another, have secured time. I presume I know the answer to the parliamentary inquiry already, but I want to call it to the attention of the Members of the House. I make the point that the members of the committee are consuming all of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not consider that the gentleman has stated a parliamentary inquiry.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that most Members of the House approach the consideration of the question of neutrality with a great deal of reluctance. We realize that it is a question full of complications, and full of possibilities of future complications which no one at this time can foresee. In fact, it is a question full of dynamite. I fully share the apprehensions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in respect to this legislation.

There is, however, an ardent public demand for neutrality legislation, which demand is based upon the popular belief that it will keep us out of war. There are those who believe that the more mandatory the provisions of this legislation are the more certain it is to keep us out of war. They believe it can be made to work automatically like a pop valve on a boiler. I sincerely wish I could share in their optimism, but I cannot.

I confess my inability to peer far enough into the future, to envision conditions which may arise from time to time concerning our diplomatic and commercial intercourse with other nations. I do know, however, that we are here and now attempting to formulate a policy to cover contingencies over which we can have no control.

I can see that once having committed ourselves to a fixed policy in the direction of neutrality we are bound to it for better or for worse. Once having announced this policy to the world, we must make up our minds to accept all of its consequences, whether beneficial or detrimental. We will have surrendered the initiative. We will have placed ourselves at the mercy of whatever combinations of other nations may result from our action. Just how far we are willing to go is only a matter of how much we are willing to sacrifice.

We must presume, when we announce our policy to the world, that we intend to adhere to it rigidly. We must not enter into the matter with our fingers crossed and regard it as a mere scrap of paper to be violated at will. We must remember that some day our very national existence may depend upon its administration. If we are willing to sacrifice our export trade; if we are willing to sacrifice our merchant marine; if we are willing to sacrifice our freedom of the seas; if we are willing to jeopardize our national existence by being forced to sit supinely helpless while a combination of nations forms to destroy us; if we are to surrender our traditional policy of a protector to weaker American nations; we can say to every nation in the world, "We refuse to trade with you under any circumstances while you are at war." That would be neutrality, absolute and mandatory, but it would not guarantee peace.

Legislation is not written for the past. It is written for the future. When we legislate for domestic affairs, we do so in order to control the future. We can have no control over the future of world affairs unless we retain our initiative. If we do not participate, our voice is lost. By mandatory legislation we may very easily precipitate what we wish to avoid.

We are by no means a self-sufficient nation. We are dependent upon other nations for many of the commodities essential to our industrial life in time of peace and our national safety in time of war. We, in turn, produce many commodities essential to other nations both in peace and war. If we refuse to sell to those nations when they are at war, they may retaliate upon us in like circumstances. If we refuse to trade with them during wartime, they may refuse to trade with us during peacetime.

Mr. Chairman, we are an exporting nation and the employment of a certain proportion of our population depends upon our export trade. We are a commercial nation. This commerce is not the commerce of the few who handle our export trade, but the commerce of the people of the Nation. It is the products of our farms, mines, mills, and factories. Place us under an embargo, either during peace or war, and a surplus of many commodities will develop. This surplus will result in lowering prices, unemployment, lower standards of living, and internal dissention. In case of war, somewhere in the world, we cannot, like a turtle, withdraw into our shell, even if we do not participate.

Mandatory neutrality is a fantastic dream, and those who so ardently advocate it would be the first to riot, if a surplus of their crops should result because of it. I wonder that they do not demand that we write a Federal subsidy into a mandatory bill to protect them in case it should ever become effective.

Just how far are we willing to surrender our freedom of the seas? If we surrender it in wartime, may it not also be curtailed in peacetime? What of our merchant marine? Do we wish it to rot in our harbors, while other nations secure the shipping trade which should be ours? The war will end but commerce will continue. We must keep our markets or lose our commerce.

How can we define in mandatory legislation what is a state of war or differentiate, beforehand, between wars which threaten to embroil us and those which do not? Mandatory legislation would apply to a comic-opera war between Balkan states or a war between two of the banana republics, just the same as one between two great maritime powers.

Whatever legislation we write is of doubtful benefit and dangerous to our future. Whatever we write must be by way of being flexible. It must be capable of being adapted to conditions which may arise. Our policy along this line must not be based upon the desires of impractical visonary fanatics. It must be based upon common sense and must recognize national needs. We must not surrender our rights of self-defense, either directly or indirectly. We must take into account our national future, because that is the heritage of our posterity. We must not mortgage it by allowing our commercial life to be threatened by a faint-hearted policy and unnecessary restrictions hastily arrived at.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this committee is to be congratulated upon their able handling of this most complex question. They have provided us with a bill which, I believe, to be workable. It is a bill which is capable of being administered to protect the future of the Nation. Certainly no President or no Congress will permit this Nation to become involved in a war if there is any alternative. I do not fear to entrust the administration of this bill to any President, whatever may be his politics, because I will trust any President to keep this Nation out of war if at all possible. I hope the bill will pass.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The Chair desires to make the statement that the time has been fixed at 30 minutes, and there remains of that time 10 minutes. The Chair will first put the question on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON]. After that amendment has been disposed of, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] for 5 minutes, and after that, if the Chair is permitted to do so, he will recognize the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY] for the other 5 minutes.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERGUSON) there were—ayes 29, noes 108.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 4 (a), beginning on line 13, page 20, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 4 (a). Upon the issuance of a proclamation under section 3 of this act the President shall proclaim a list of materials of war, and thereafter it shall be unlawful to export any such materials of war from any place in the United States to or for the use of any belligerent states, either directly or indirectly."

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I intend to introduce two other amendments following this one and at the proper time I shall ask the indulgence of the House through unanimous consent to permit me to explain those amendments which I intend to offer.

Thus far in this debate everyone has talked around the question but not to the point, which is the choice of profits through wartime trade, or giving up such profits and trade for peace. There has been nothing directed to real neutrality. We even had an amendment offered and approved by the committee, in spite of the fact it was not considered within the Foreign Affairs Committee. The amendment says that 2 years from now we will again think about this matter. I presume if my good friend the gentleman from Tennessee is the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee at that time we will not have an opportunity to properly and fairly consider the question on the floor of the House.

My amendment simply adds the words "materials of war" to "arms, ammunition, and implements of war." A great deal has been said in the public press and from the public platform about profits in war, war booms, and the devastating after effects of war.

May I read from an address of our President. I do not know whether the committee considered the President's views while they were considering the neutrality bill which has been offered here, or, perhaps I should say the so-called neutrality bill that has been offered us.

Our President said at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 14 of last year:

> Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men. For the Nation as a whole it produces disaster.

Do not forget that. The President said that to the people during the last campaign, and the people answered him on November 3.

In his address at Chautauqua the President also said:

> Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches, fool's gold, would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

I charge we are evading neutrality now. We are violating the promise of the President to the American people in this measure which the Foreign Affairs Committee has offered to you. In this bill we are attempting to take care of those thousands of Americans who are seeking fool's gold. Let us not deceive ourselves that the McReynolds bill will cause any great heartache to those who desire to sell their goods to nations at war. The McReynolds bill allows this dangerous trade to continue without the least restriction.

This amendment is for the purpose of correcting one of the evils existing in this so-called neutrality measure. My amendment, simply stated, provides that materials of war can be embargoed. They are just as necessary for the fighting of a war as arms, and the sale of such materials is just as dangerous to our peace.

The President further said:

> It would be hard to resist that clamor. It would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond and realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning that comes from false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed if war should come would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

You on this side of the House subscribed to that position in your districts before your people. You also supported the Democratic platform, which reads—

> We shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others; * * * to guard against being drawn by * * * private trade into any war which may develop anywhere.

Now, what do I propose under this amendment? I propose to stop a false boom. If we do not stop this boom, which can develop very easily, through the use of the $7,000,000,000 of foreign money now in this country, such a boom would have dangerous results, for, with the drying up of the funds, a profitable trade would be cut off and hundreds of Americans thrown out of employment. It would indeed be a hard, if not impossible, task to resist this clamor for continuance of this trade. Such action would place us right back where we were in those dangerous years of 1914–17. It was this policy more than any other one which forced us into the World War. We must now take over against any repetition of this disaster. In the words of the President:

> If we face the choice of profits and peace, the Nation will answer, must answer, "We choose peace."
> It is the duty of all of us to encourage such a body of public opinion in this country that the answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous.

This can be done only by having the power to embargo war materials made mandatory.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, we are facing a very serious situation in this House at this time. We are considering now the most important section in this bill, and here we are gagged, the time cut down, so it is impossible for us to offer the amendments which we in a bona-fide way propose to offer.

When this bill came before this House 2 years ago we were given 20 minutes on each side to debate one of the most important bills that has come before the Congress of the United States, to keep this country out of war.

Last year, again, we were gagged to 40 minutes. Today, when this matter is up for consideration, we are again gagged, so that we cannot offer our amendments with sufficient time for debate.

What is the force back of this? Oh, it is the greed and lust to carry on trade and garner ill-gotten gains from behind the war lines.

The American people are calling for a real neutrality bill. Instead of giving them a loaf of bread, we are giving them a stone.

I am sorry the situation has arisen, but the American people will not stand for profiteers making profits out of war by carrying on a trade which will make millionaires again, as it has in the past, and garner tremendous amounts of blood money.

I wish I had had an opportunity to offer my amendment, with adequate time to discuss it. We are here giving the President discretionary power. I have great confidence in the President, but you recall what took place when this problem was put before President Woodrow Wilson in the World War. Finally, he succumbed to the pressure, loans were made to belligerents, and inevitably we were drawn into war.

The same loophole is left open here. I do not want anybody, whether he is a Republican President or a Democratic President, to have the power to make it possible for us to be dragged into war. I want the Congress of the United States to have that power as the Constitution gives it to us.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. As I understand the amendment, which the gentleman will offer in a few minutes, provides for mandatory neutrality. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. It does.

Mr. BOILEAU. It strikes out the discretionary features and makes the provisions of section 4 mandatory?

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. It does.

This amendment makes mandatory a cash-and-carry policy on all goods exported by sea to any port or place which can be reached only by traversing those waters adjacent to a belligerent nation and which are within the zone of belligerent operations. This section does not in any way apply to shipments of articles and commodities either by land or on the Great Lakes. The reasons for confining our policy to exports by sea alone are simple and are not subject to question.

First. No effective or permanent neutrality policy can be established which has for a fundamental basis the assumption that our relations with Canada can be placed upon the same basis as our relations with non-American states.

Second. The protection of American lives and property during periods of neutrality is one of protecting those lives and that property upon the high seas exclusively. The only two wars in which we have participated that grew out of maritime or neutral maritime difficulties found their basis upon questions affecting sea-borne commerce and sea-borne passenger carrying.

Third. In any future war in which Canada may become a zone of belligerent operations any neutrality policy we might have would go by the boards. The continuance of the Monroe doctrine, the protection of this country, and the protection of vast American commercial interests would alone govern our action in such a war.

This amendment makes mandatory a cash-and-carry policy on all sea-borne commerce to such places as can be reached only by traversing the actual zones of belligerency. The reasons for making mandatory these provisions are simple and undeniable.

First. International law and international practice establish the fact that goods considered by the belligerents to be contraband shall be subject to seizure and that the ship carrying such goods be equally subject to seizure. Limited contraband is subject to detention and requisition by the power seizing those goods.

Second. The head of a neutral state or the government of that state has no power to declare what is and what is not contraband or limited contraband of war. That determination rests solely with the belligerent powers.

Third. The determination of contraband and limited contraband in warfare is made solely upon the grounds of self-preservation and self-interest.

Fourth. The action of a neutral nation in declaring an embargo on certain articles and commodities during a period of actual hostilities cannot but be regarded as a discriminatory and unneutral act by the belligerent upon whom the embargo weighs most heavily. The same action taken prior to the existence of belligerency cannot be regarded as an overt act of discrimination because of the fact that the action is taken when no injury is done.

Fifth. The use of discretionary power by the President in stopping shipments of certain articles and commodities while other articles and commodities are permitted to enter the channels of trade with belligerents would be discriminatory as previously explained and would constitute a technical act of war the consequences of which would jeopardize the American position as a neutral nation.

This amendment applies not only to American exports of commodities but to American vessels as well. The reasons for the placement of these limitations upon the merchant marine are easily understood.

First. Any vessel, regardless of its neutral character, entering actual war zones with cargoes destined to the ports of a belligerent is subject to destruction and seizure if it carries any articles or commodities regarded as being contraband or limited contraband of war by either of the belligerent parties. The risks run by such a vessel are limited only to seizure of ship and cargo if the intercepting force is capable of maintaining control of those belligerent waters. The life of all on board such vessels is in danger if the intercepting craft is a submarine or aircraft which cannot by virtue of its character go through the processes of search and seizure.

Second. The United States Navy cannot protect merchant ships in zones of belligerent operations if those zones are established contiguously to European or Asiatic nations. The difficulties of operating such a protecting fleet thousands of miles from its bases makes such a policy impossible, even if we were to have a navy second to none or twice as big as any other naval power—a condition which does not exist.

Third. The use of the United States Navy as a convoying or protective agency for merchant vessels in belligerent zones contiguous to European or Asiatic states would be possible only through the maintenance of operating bases in those waters, a condition which could only be brought about through a declaration of war on one side or the other, whereby we could be assigned naval bases by our allies. Such an action would end the neutrality which is the object of this legislation.

This amendment does not deprive American merchant vessels of their carrying trade to any ports outside said belligerent zones. Commerce with other neutrals would be limited only to the extent where it was necessary to protect our citizens from actual loss of life and property. The past practice of providing sea lanes in belligerent zones, whereby neutral ships might carry cargoes to neutral ports, has been amply demonstrated.

This amendment gives us the widest possible extension of foreign trade during periods of neutrality that can be provided without danger to American property and life.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DUNN) there were—ayes 30, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska: Page 20, line 19, after "Sec. 4", strike out the entire section through page 23, line 12, ending "this section shall apply equally to all belligerents", and insert: "(a) Whenever the President shall have issued the proclamation as provided in section 3 of this act, thereafter it shall be unlawful for any American person to retain or assert any right, title, or interest in any article or commodity exported by sea from the United States to any port or place which can be reached only by traversing those waters adjacent to a belligerent state which are within the zone of belligerent operations as determined by the President, and no such right, title, or interest shall be recognized by the Government of the United States or by any court or officer of the United States, and any contract for the insurance of any article or commodity so exported, or any American interest therein, or any American vessel carrying such article or commodity, shall be null and void and unenforceable in any court of the United States.

"(b) When in the judgment of the President the conditions which have caused him to issue the proclamation as provided in section 3 of this act shall have ceased to exist, he shall revoke same and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were—ayes 41, noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McREYNOLDS and Mr. COFFEE of Washington rose.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, is it in order now to offer a preferential motion to strike out the enacting clause before the amendments offered by the gentleman from Tennessee? The gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE] has been trying to get recognition for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was endeavoring to dispose of all of the amendments to this particular section before recognizing the gentleman with a preferential motion, which the Chair intends to do after the amendments are disposed of.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: Page 21, line 7, after the word "materials", insert "overseas."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: Page 22, line 6, after the word "materials", insert "other than personal goods and effects."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KOPPLEMANN: Strike out from the last two words in line 17, down to and including the words "it shall", in line 24, on page 21, and after the word "thereafter", in line 24, insert the words "it shall"; strike out the words beginning in line 24, except the word "any", down to and including the word "prescribed", on page 22, line 1.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 3 minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have no objection if the gentleman will talk about his amendment and explain it, instead of talking about the chairman of the committee. I want the gentleman to explain his amendment, because that is what the Committee is interested in. Does the gentleman agree to this?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I have asked for 3 minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut?

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KOPPLEMANN: After the words "this act", in line 22, strike out the rest of that line, the rest of that page, lines 1 to 4, inclusive, on page 22, and the words "claim and it shall" in line 5; after the word "thereafter", in line 5, insert the words "it shall"; after the word "unlawful", in line 5, strike out the rest of that line and line 6 up to the last word; in line 7 change the word "such" to the word "any"; in line 12 of page 21 strike out all the rest of this subsection, beginning with the words "the President shall."

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

Mr. CARTER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COFFEE of Washington moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the thing against which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] was aiming in this bill was the fact that the bill contains no restriction upon the free sale and transport by the people of the United States of essential or raw materials of war.

Section 4 of this bill contains a provision giving the President discretionary power to restrict certain designated essential or raw materials of war and provides that the same may not be shipped in American ships, but shipped in foreign bottoms, and then only after the title has been transferred to the vendee.

I had hoped, until the chairman of the committee, on his own motion, restricted debate to 30 minutes, to offer an amendment providing for a wartime quota on the sale of war materials.

I want to remind the House that every peace society in America is on record in favor of a peacetime quota for the transportation and sale of essential materials of war. There is no provision in this bill for the taking of private profits out of the sale of essential materials of war, except under such restrictions as are provided by the President. In other words, we still can sell to belligerents in time of war essential materials of war—not munitions, but essential materials of war.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] offered an amendment providing for an embargo in time of war upon these essential war materials.

Stephen Raushenbush, who is, perhaps, America's foremost expert on this subject, in a personal letter to myself, made this illuminating statement:

* * * The two pending bills, the Pittman bill and the McReynolds bill, do not, however, remove the incentive for us to take sides with our largest customers. They do not, in other words, do anything to prevent a war boom from getting started.

Every peacetime organization, including the National Council for the Prevention of War, the American Council Against War and Fascism, as well as all of the leading organizations that have spent years of study on this subject, inveigh against section 4 because section 4 does not prohibit, neither does it restrict, the sale of essential war materials to belligerents in time of war. The only thing the McReynolds bill does is to give the President discretionary power to limit sale of these goods to those which are transported in foreign ships and limiting also shipment of war materials to those of which the title is transferred to the vendee at the point of delivery.

I submit to the Members of the House that unless this bill is so amended as to restrict to a peacetime quota—a quota, in other words, determined by averaging over a preceding number of years for the sale of war material—we have failed to enact a worth-while neutrality bill, and for this purpose I intend now to offer an amendment, based upon a provision in the Pittman bill of last year, pending in the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, which will provide for a peacetime quota, restricted to the average over a preceding number of years, of war materials to belligerents in time of war, and providing further that such war materials shall not be shipped in American bottoms, and providing further that the title thereto shall be transferred to the vendee at the delivery point. This will satisfy the peace and neutrality organizations in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer this amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a motion pending, made by the gentleman from Washington himself.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I rise in opposition to the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and I will tell you why.

A most instructive and patriotic address was delivered this afternoon by our distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] on the subject of liberty. It inspired me. It stirred my emotions. There is a historical legend referable to Thomas Jefferson and Thomas Payne, who had a controversy on the subject of liberty. Thomas Jefferson is alleged to have stated that "where liberty is, there is where my home is." Thomas Payne replied, "Where liberty is not, there is where my home is"; and immediately thereafter he sailed for France after his glorious contribution to the American cause to help to establish a republic in France. In front of the White House is Lafayette Square. In that historic section we find the great monuments dedicated and consecrated to the memory of Rochambeau, Lafayette, Pulaski, Kosciusko, and Baron von Steuben, all patriotic foreigners of different nationalities, who came to aid America to establish this liberty-loving Nation of ours.

Throughout the civilized world a great conflict is now being waged between two forms of government. One is fascism of the right and left type, symbolizing the powerful pressure that is being utilized by dictators to subvert the will of the majority through force and the power of authority. Second, we have parliamentary constitutional democracies that stand for liberty, freedom, and justice. The three great, powerful nations who have thus far withstood the ravages of fascism and are battling to preserve and conserve parliamentary constitutional democracies are the United States, Great Britain, and France.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that today all thinking citizens have come to a greater appreciation of the doctrines of Woodrow Wilson than ever before. For today democracy is more imperiled than it ever was in the days of the Kaiser.

We joined the allied powers to wage war against the forces of autocracy because we clearly foresaw that if those powers were permitted to defeat the forces of democracy represented by England and France we should be the next target. Woodrow Wilson was a greater political realist than he has been given credit for. He understood clearly that the British Empire is our first line of defense. If any autocratic power should defeat or destroy the British Empire, our Nation's safety as a democracy would be jeopardized. So we went to war to make the world safe for democracy, believing that the destruction of the autocratic forces of Europe would be a guaranty for the security of our democratic regime in the United States.

But it seems that the defeat of the autocratic forces were not sufficiently decisive, for no sooner was kaiserism destroyed than fascism and other sinister forces raised their ugly heads and established a regime of despotism more tyrannical than kaiserism ever was. The Fascist organization is more bent upon conquest and world domination than was the old regime. Under the old order in Europe, there was a semblance of majority rule. The Fascist regime, however, has established a principle of authority versus majority, and in so doing has introduced an order of regulated force which reflects the order of the jungle, where might makes right.

This Fascist jungle rule is tyrannical in its internal affairs and aggressively imperialistic in external policies. It has declared open war, not only against all democratic forces within its own boundaries but against all democratic powers without. The Fascist group, in all of its colors, has abrogated the rights of man and has declared a war against all forces of the spirit. To entrench itself economically the Fascist regime has embarked upon a policy of armament, not only of a greater and more military strength but also to cope with its unemployment problem. In view of the imperialistic designs of the Fascist authorities, this armament policy constitutes a definite threat to democratic countries which it hates and tries to overwhelm. Fascism is out to crush democracy, and it says so openly. To defend themselves these democratic countries must arm themselves to the teeth.

America is usually a peaceful nation, but still the Fascist states compel us to increase our armament and to spend billions for preparedness. England and France, the two great European democracies, are our first line of defense. If you strike out the enacting clause of this bill, and prevent the passage of this neutrality bill that would give the President discretionary powers to help our European democracies, whose very safety is being jeopardized by the dictators of Europe, we may become the next victims of the wrath of the Fascist nations.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the British Empire is our first line of defense, and their military strength is our military strength, and their safety is our safety. We should cooperate in every way that we can to protect the parliamentary constitutional democracies of England and France. I would even be in favor of canceling the debts that they owe to our country in order to proclaim to these dictatorial, fascistic nations who are jeopardizing the peace of the world that the material and financial resources of the United States are behind the two great powerful parliamentary constitutional democracies, England and France, in their endeavor to preserve their democratic forms of government. Such a move by us would insure world peace.

Two potent reasons compel me to advocate such a policy: First, we are a part and parcel of the Anglo-Saxon civilization, of which we are all proud and which we all want to see perpetuated. The fall of the British Empire would be a terrible catastrophe for Anglo-Saxon civilization. We simply cannot remain indifferent to the destinies of this Empire; when it is attacked we must come to its aid. The three great democracies, France, the British Empire, and the United States, must either defend the democratic regime or be destroyed separately. Either all three democracies will survive and then make the rest of humanity democratic or they will all be destroyed. It is for this reason that from the point of view of our own interests, as a democracy, we cannot be indifferent to an attack of the Fascist powers against any major democratic country in Europe. There is not one American citizen with an understanding of the international situation who would be indifferent to such an attack. Thus our neutrality legislation cannot disregard these two factors—the British Empire as our first line of defense and the British Empire as the center of Anglo-Saxon civilization, of which we are a part and in whose survival we are vitally interested.

It is possible that in the future a major Fascist power will attack and destroy a minor democratic state in whose existence America, as a democracy, is interested. Can it be said that American democracy will look indifferently at such an attack? Every American citizen will resent it and will side with the victim. A democratic government as ourselves must express in its policies the sentiments of the majority of its population.

The neutrality legislation that we are now enacting for a period of 2 years, giving our President discretionary power, is only experimental. We can always improve it. Absolute neutrality is only found in death. Our American neutrality policy, therefore, should and must always be relative and elastic, and not rigid and absolute.

I sincerely trust that the motion of my distinguished colleague from Washington to strike out the enacting clause do not prevail, and that this splendid neutrality bill that is now being debated, amended, and considered be passed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COFFEE of Washington: Page 20, line 17, after the word "revocation", strike out all of section 4 of said bill, commencing with the word "export", on line 18, page 20, to and including the word "belligerents", in line 12, page 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. (a) Whenever during any war in which the United States is neutral the President shall find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment from the United States to belligerent countries of certain articles or materials used in the manufacture of arms, ammunition, or implements of war, or in the conduct of war, will serve to promote the security and preserve the neutrality of the United States, or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, or that to refrain from placing such restrictions would contribute to a prolongation or expansion of the war, he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, or sell for export, such articles or materials from any place in the United States to any belligerent country named in the proclamation, or to any neutral country for transshipment to or for the use of any such belligerent country in excess of a normal amount, in quantity and kind, of exports from the United States to the respective belligerent countries prior to the date of the proclamation, such normal amount to constitute the average of shipments during a previous period of years to be determined by the President: Provided, That no restriction or prohibition imposed under this section shall under any circumstances be applied to food or medical supplies: Provided further, That no such articles or materials may be transshipped from the boundaries of the United States, as hereinabove delimited, until all rights, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such articles or materials shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which they are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials.

Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or airship contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States: Provided further, That subsequent to said proclamation by the President it shall be unlawful for any vessel or aircraft of the United States to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent country, or to any neutral country for transshipment to or for the use of any such belligerent country.

(b) The President shall, by proclamation, definitely enumerate the articles or materials the exportation of which is to be restricted, and he may, from time to time, modify or revoke, in whole or in part, any proclamation issued by him under this section when he shall find that the conditions which caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist or have so changed as to justify, in his opinion, such modification or revocation.

(c) The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such restrictions as are imposed under this section to other countries as and when they may become involved in such war.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COFFEE of Washington) there were—ayes 24, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: Page 23, after line 12, insert a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. Any provisions herein included shall apply to communications, controls, including cable, radio, and mail dispatches, and to give to the President full authority to amplify, restrict, or curtail such services as may to him seem required in the interest of peace or of averting possible or actual hostility."

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not intrude upon the patience of the body more than to say that if this amendment is embodied in the bill it will allow the conferees to touch a subject which is important in my mind and which should not have been ignored in the preparation of a measure as vital as this.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, this is a question that would have to be given serious consideration. It might be a good thought, but we cannot afford to accept it and put it in the bill under these conditions. It is too far-reaching.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman inasmuch as 10 minutes have not yet been consumed on the amendment.

CONTROL OF COMMUNICATIONS—A REAL DANGER

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has been offered would be a real danger if incorporated into this bill. The suggestion that communications and the control of communications and news from Europe or any part of the world where war is going on should be put into the hands of one man is the most dangerous suggestion that has been offered in connection with the entire debate upon this bill.

If there is anything that will preserve the free thinking and clear opinion of the American people with regard to any problem of war, it is that the lines of communication and correspondence shall be free and open, that we will know what is going on in the world.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. While I am in complete agreement with the statement the gentleman just made, my amendment is offered to provoke thought and prevent the spread of propaganda that always precedes an international conflagration. I do not think we have any quarrel.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appreciate the opportunity to bring to this body also a statement of the President in the address last summer that was already mentioned by the gentleman from Connecticut. He then said:

> We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide have a sufficiently detailed understanding of international affairs to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war, and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say "no" to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war.

As an illustration of the importance of free expression of facts concerning the development of dangerous conditions abroad, I might call attention to a few lines that appeared in a column in one of the Washington papers yesterday morning. It said:

> Argentine purchased more military airplanes and military equipment from the United States last February than any other country, totaling $703,800. This despite the Roosevelt-inspired Buenos Aires Peace Conference. Mr. Hull, however, is pointing to reciprocity, since Argentina in turn is selling us more corn than ever before. During the first week of March 2,774,000 bushels arrived.

Those of you who are familiar with the findings of the Nye committee of investigation know that page after page of their report is consumed in detailing the way in which the embargoes on arms have been evaded by countries in Latin America, and yet in this bill we have a specific section that exempts Latin-American republics from the application of the act. This makes those countries the cesspools for the operations of the international merchants of death.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If there is a joker in this bill, it is in the provision that provides exemptions whereby your district and your district and your district is taxed to provide money to pay for corn-hog checks to keep the farmers of America from growing corn so that a market can be created here for the importation of 2,774,000 bushels of corn in 1 week to establish a balance of trade to pay for $703,000 worth of airplane equipment to go to other countries engaged in war at this time. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 5. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation as provided for in section 3 of this act, it shall thereafter during the period of the war or civil strife be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent state or state wherein civil strife exists, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any person acting for or on behalf of such government, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government or person, or to solicit or receive any contribution for any such government, or political subdivision, or any person acting for or on behalf of such government or subdivision: Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its nationals, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions.

(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of the President's proclamation.

(c) Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section or of any regulations issued hereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or agent thereof participating in the violation may be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

(d) When the President shall have revoked his proclamation as provided for in section 3 of this act, the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Committee amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: On page 24, in line 10, after the period, insert: "Nothing in this subsection (A) shall be construed to prohibit the solicitation or collection of funds to be used for medical aid and assistance or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering when made for a person or persons or organization when not acting for or on behalf of such government or political faction wherein civil strife exists."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the attention of the membership for 2 or 3 minutes. I want to show why I have offered this amendment. It is really an explanation of what is contained in the original provision, but there has been so much misinterpretation, some of it intentional and some of it innocent; as to what the other section meant, that I do this for explanation.

Here is the section that raised the controversy. Here is the section where you got the picture of the little girl, and they stated that you should vote against this section of the McReynolds bill because you could not send relief to Spain.

I want to say that there is no such thing in this bill. Remember, this section prohibits the loaning or the extending of any loans to any foreign government or belligerent, and that is followed with this:

> Or to solicit or receive any contribution for any such government or political subdivision or faction, or any person acting for or on behalf of such government or subdivision.

The only purpose of that provision is to prevent taking up collections in this country and sending them to belligerent governments, but the statement has been made, especially by those who are in sympathy with a certain crowd in the Spanish rebellion, that this would prohibit the sending of medical supplies, and so forth, which it does not. I have added this amendment to show it. This is the amendment:

> Nothing in subsection (a) shall be construed to prohibit the solicitation or collection of funds to be used for medical aid and assistance or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering when made for a person or persons or organizations when not acting for or on behalf of such government or political factions wherein civil strife exists.

In other words, all we prohibit is the collection of funds to be sent to the belligerent government. They can collect money for persons for relief of any character regardless of whatever it may be.

The statement has been made that no relief organization, not even the Red Cross, is in Spain today. I checked on this through Admiral Grayson's office, and was told that there are 10 representatives of the International Red Cross in Spain and that they are administering relief to both sides. The American Red Cross has already donated $15,000 to be used for that purpose, and another call has been made to which they will respond.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. EATON. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the statement our chairman is making ought to gain the support of every man in this House regardless of previous considerations. I for one am strong for it. I think it is a most excellent addition.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is presumably a humanitarian one, and that is undoubtedly the intention of its author. I hope that the chairman of the committee is not correct; that the bill permits the sending of relief even without this amendment, and I hope the amendment will be voted down. There is nothing humanitarian about any part of war. Let there be no misunderstanding; when you aid either the army through supplying medical supplies or the civilian population who are backing up the army, you are only prolonging the war and permitting the killing of more soldiers. The thing that ended the World War was not the Allied Armies' defeating the German Army; it was the collapse of the German people behind the German Army.

Every dollar that we send to help any sufferers—of course, everybody is a sufferer in a war—prolongs the war. The sooner a war is over, the sooner the suffering will stop. Every dollar that you send to buy medical supplies for the combatants or food and clothing for the civilian population behind the army means taking a man's life.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. According to the gentleman's theory the Red Cross and other humanitarian organizations ought not to help relieve suffering in case of war?

Mr. MAAS. Exactly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is the gentleman against the Red Cross' participating in war to relieve suffering?

Mr. MAAS. I am against our assisting in continuing European or other wars by any means. The sooner the collapse comes the fewer men will be killed and the sooner the war will be over. If we send money for ambulances, medical supplies, food, and clothing it means that just that much money will not have to be diverted from the purchase of munitions by warring peoples.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, that is the reason it is limited to humanitarian organizations.

Mr. MAAS. What is the difference? If you contribute to humanitarian organizations, then the Government does not have to spend what it otherwise would have to spend for such purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is not to be contributed to the Government.

Mr. MAAS. That does not make any difference, it is an indirect aid to the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is to be contributed to Red Cross and other relief organizations.

Mr. MAAS. Every dollar spent in supporting the civilian population behind an army prolongs the war, just as definitely as if you give bullets to the army. Modern wars are not duels between armies; they are basic struggles of peoples; and when we aid the people who are belligerents, we are aiding their armies, we are participating in the conflict, and we shall be drawn into it, regardless. Nothing so inflames a people as the bombing of Red Cross units. If we organize and send abroad such units to aid in places where wars are going on, these units are bound to be shelled or bombed from the air. When an American Red Cross hospital or ambulance is hit while operating in a foreign war zone, the result will be fierce denunciation in this country, with an inflamed public opinion that will put us in a war frame of mind. We are likely to become engaged in wars in which we have no natural concern whatever. Let us mind our own business and keep out of foreign brawls. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOILEAU to the amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: Strike out all after the word "suffering" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "among noncombatants."

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, first of all let me say that I agree with the statement of the distinguished chairman of this committee when he says that his amendment does not mean anything. I agree with him just 100 percent. His amendment does not mean one single thing except that it serves the purpose, I am sure, of partly confusing this issue. He said that it was his understanding that the bill without this amendment meant exactly the same as it would with the amendment. I agree with him absolutely that it means the same thing either way. It means, Mr. Chairman, that hereafter if this amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee should be adopted, people could not solicit, or collect, or receive funds in this country for the purpose of buying medical supplies, or giving medical aid to a government or to a warring faction in case of civil strife. They permit such collection if they can find someone who has absolutely no interest in the war, who is not acting on behalf of his government, or his faction, or a faction with which he is in sympathy. If they can find such a human being they can make relief collections for him, but they cannot supply it to him if he is acting for his government.

But any man or woman who presumes to be friendly to his government or his own faction would naturally be acting in behalf of his or her own group, faction, or government in receiving the money for medical supplies, medical assistance, or food to relieve human suffering. I submit therefore the amendment offered by the genteman from Tennessee means nothing. If you want to humanize this thing, I suggest you should remove that restriction and enable the people in this country whose hearts, will, and desire is to give assistance to other people along the line of medical aid and assistance, food or clothing for noncombatants, to do so; and that is as far as I go in that respect. The amendment offered by the gentleman goes really further than I do with reference to food and clothing. If the people of this country want to make contributions, let us give those contributions to anyone who will see that they are properly used. You cannot find a person in Spain today, I dare say, who would accept this responsibility, whether it is on the Fascist side or the democratic-government side of the controversy. You could not find anyone who would assume the responsibility of taking this medical aid, assistance, or food and use it in the interest of humanity, because all of them have taken sides and they would insist upon acting on behalf of their own side. They would be an agent of their government. As a result, it would be unlawful to have the money used in that way. It just does not make sense. If we are going to act upon the impulse of our hearts, if we are going to act because we believe it is fair and just to aid a peope who are in this distress, let us take away these ridiculous provisions and limitations.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the Members to bear in mind that the McReynolds amendment means nothing. The gentleman has admitted that.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The explanation of it.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman will agree with me that his amendment means nothing?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I agree with the gentleman it means nothing because the same provisions of the amendment are contained in the bill itself.

Mr. BOILEAU. It means nothing. So do not be fooled.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment was offered for the purpose of clarifying something that did not need clarification.

It is clear to anyone. It falls short of doing the job right. Let us not be so picayunish and so small that we are not willing to say anyone who wants to turn this money over to help suffering humanity cannot do so unless he does it this way or that.

Bear in mind the amendment I have offered to the gentleman's amendment retains this part of the gentleman's language:

Nothing in this subsection (a) shall be construed to prohibit the solicitation or collection of funds to be used for medical aid and assistance or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering.

That much of the gentleman's amendment I have retained, and I have just added "among noncombatants." The food and clothing would be sent, not to those who are combatants but only to noncombatants.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the difference in the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] in lieu of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, is simply this: The amendment offered by the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee would authorize contributions to individuals or humanitarian organizations but not to the belligerent governments—to organizations who were independent of and not under the control of the governments at war—whereas the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] specifically authorizes those contributions to be made to the governments that may be at war. Here is the vice of his amendment. We have provision in here that our people cannot make loans to belligerent governments and they cannot ship goods to the belligerent governments under such conditions. Under the gentleman's amendment [Mr. BOILEAU], we could make contributions to the governments at war. This would permit an evasion and would nullify the prohibition against loans and gifts would be made instead of loans.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. Just for this particular purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I know that, but it goes to the governments. The point I make is that we are endeavoring to pass a neutrality law. We are saying we will not lend money to the belligerents. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin would cause collections to be taken up and given to the various governments, and this would afford opportunity for evasion of the law.

Mr. BOILEAU. The money only.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. While we are willing to help suffering humanity, we say the money should be contributed to organizations like the Red Cross that are not a part of the governments themselves, because the government, as another gentleman stated, might use the money for war purposes rather than for humanitarian purposes. The difference between the two amendments is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] is one to help humanity, whereas the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin would help the belligerent governments. That is the difference.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman will admit my amendment does not provide that the money can be turned over for all purposes. It provides that the money may be collected to provide only medical aid and food.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; but it is paid to the government, and there is the vice of the amendment; the warring governments will use it as they please, and once they secure possession of the money we will be powerless to prevent them spending it as they please.

Mr. BOILEAU. But to noncombatants only.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment is vicious in that it provides that contributions may be taken up in this country and sent to warring governments.

The governments, as the other gentleman said awhile ago, may spend it for munitions or whatever purpose they like. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee provides that during a war they shall not take up collections in this country or receive contributions for warring nations. The evidence shows in New York alone one organization had raised $125,000 on behalf of one side of the war factions in Spain. We want to stop that. We want our people to be neutral, and having meetings and raising money for factions at war is not neutrality. The question was asked, Are you going to prevent the giving of humanitarian help over there? The section as written did not prevent that, but in order to eliminate any question that such could be done the gentleman from Tennessee offers the amendment which permits contributions to these organizations for humanitarian purposes only.

However, this does not satisfy the gentleman from Minnesota and those who are taking sides. They want their money contributed to the warring factions or governments at war, and we are against this. It is not neutrality. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BOILEAU] should be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were—ayes 16, noes 87.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. MCREYNOLDS: Page 23, line 21, after the comma after the word "Government", insert "or on behalf of any faction of any state wherein civil strife exists."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. MCREYNOLDS: Page 24, line 1, after the word "subdivision", insert the words "or faction."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN VESSELS PROHIBITED FROM CARRYING ARMS

SEC. 6. Whenever the President shall issue a proclamation provided for in section 3 of this act, thereafter, until the proclamation shall have been revoked, it shall be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any belligerent state named in such proclamation as being at war or to a state wherein civil strife is proclaimed to exist, or to any other state, transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent state or a state wherein civil strife is proclaimed to exist.

Whoever, in violation of the provisions of this section, shall take, attempt to take, or shall authorize, hire, or solicit another to take any such vessel carrying such cargo out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and in addition such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and the arms, ammunition, and implements of war on board shall be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a clarifying amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCREYNOLDS: Page 25, line 8, strike out the comma after the word "state" and insert the word "for."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REES of Kansas: Page 25, line 6, after the word "war", insert "or other commodities."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order against the amendment. Commodities are not included in this section.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I reserve the point of order if the gentleman desires to make an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Here is an opportunity, if we really want to stay out of such entanglements as we had in the World War. Let us keep American ships out of belligerent waters, whether they are carrying ammunition, implements of war, merchandise, or whatever commodities they may be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This matter is taken care of in another provision of the bill, section 4 (a), in reference to prohibiting American ships from carrying other commodities.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I am not sure the paragraph is clear and definite enough.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. I think if the gentleman will examine the bill, he will find section 4 (a) will take care of this situation.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Then I withdraw the amendment. But I still believe that the provision in section 4 does not take care of the situation, for the reason that section 4 of the bill leaves the question at the discretion of the President as to whether any articles or materials are to be excluded from American ships, and then section 4 provides that the President shall from time to time definitely enumerate the articles and materials which shall be unlawful for American vessels to transport. My amendment makes it unlawful for any American vessel to carry any commodities to any belligerent state that is at war or where civil strife is proclaimed to exist. I believe the law should be mandatory that American vessels should not be allowed to carry any commodities to belligerent nations in time of war.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, only in Committee of the Whole do we have a chance to vote on these amendments, and that is not a record vote. Therefore, I think it is only fair to those of us who desire that we be permitted to tell the Members of the House and people throughout the country where we stand on these amendments.

I voted for these amendments. I shall vote to recommit the bill, if the question comes up, in order to have the Pittman amendment come up for consideration on this bill. If we cannot get that amendment, I am going to vote for this bill, and I will tell you why.

It is a step in the right direction toward peace. Even though it is a very weak step, I am willing to take this step with you. I may say here, as I said the other day, I am against what is known as the policy of freedom of the seas.

I am opposed, secondly, to giving discretion to the President in this case, not because I do not have a great deal of confidence in the present President—I have—but because during war, there is hysteria, there is provocation, there is pressure, and there is propaganda, which even the President of the United States cannot withstand. Therefore I am against giving discretion to the President.

Third. I am in favor of having a peace quota on those things which are not war implements. This was the amendment we tried to pass on here a while ago.

Fourth. I believe the United States should refuse to give protection not only to cargoes but also to ships which are carrying implements of war.

Fifth. I am against all profits in war.

Sixth. I will go a step further and agree with my friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], who said the only solution is not only to take all profits out of war but to let the Government produce and construct all war implements. I am willing to go with him in that effort, but until we achieve it I want to take all profits out of war.

Lastly, I want to speak of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], in which he suggested that during peacetime, as well as in time of war, we should refuse to permit people in the United States to send implements of war into any country. Why? I hear people on the floor of the House cry "Peace, peace", and I wonder if in their hearts they really want peace. Some people want peace, but they want it in such a way as to ship supplies to Spain.

Let me say if the modern Sancho Panzas and Don Quixotes in Spain want to fight each other, let them go to it, but I for one want to keep from sending any implements of war to them to enable them to carry on their fight. It is all right to ship the necessities of life and medical supplies to them, but that is all. As to implements of war, let us prohibit their export in time of peace, as well as in time of war.

The objection made by the chairman of this committee was that the amendment was introduced by a Republican. Mr. Chairman, a great Republican whom all of us, Democrats as well as Republicans, honor and revere, Abraham Lincoln, was charged with being an abolitionist, the epithet of that day. What was his reply? He said, "I will go with the abolitionists as long as they are right, and I will turn from them when they are wrong."

Therefore, if some Member on the other side of the House, Mr. FISH, in this instance, introduces an amendment which will prevent the United States from shipping implements of war during times of peace, I have the right to follow him if he is right, even though he is a Republican.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Another thing said by the chairman was that this was not introduced in the committee room. Has it come to such a pass that here on the floor of the House amendments cannot be offered and supported? I think the mere fact it was not offered in the committee should not preclude us from supporting it.

I am afraid we are forgetting 20 years ago—1917. I am afraid we forget the causes of war and their consequences. The gentleman from Oklahoma got up on the floor of the House here and said:

> Our trade must be protected, not only that of the shippers but the trade of the people.

Does the gentleman forget that the World War cost the people of the United States $40,000,000,000? Does he forget that the Allies today owe this country $11,000,000,000? Does not this offset all the trade of the United States during war? I am afraid we forget the blood that was shed in that war. I am afraid we forget our soldiers lying on the fields of France. I am afraid we forget 20 years ago, and since that time, the deception of the European powers when they came begging for money to arm themselves again. I am afraid we forget the riding of the four horsemen of the Apocalypse during that frightful war and for years thereafter. I am afraid we forget the terrible injury to the morale of our whole people. I am afraid that we forget that it almost destroyed our modern civilization.

Mr. Chairman, a great English poet, Rudyard Kipling, wrote one of the finest poems, I believe, in the English language—The Recessional—and this is the way he closes it:

> Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet
> Lest we forget, lest we forget.

I wonder if we should not remember, and not forget, the years of 1917 and 1918 as a lasting lesson on the futility of war? [Applause.]

Mr. VOORHIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am intensely interested in this subject. I am afraid I am being forced to the conclusion that, as a matter of fact, the House of Representatives is really not ready to pass judgment on this question. [Applause.]

I had hope we could amend this measure to make it strong and frank and clear-cut. Already I know we cannot do so. I shall vote for it, I suppose, as the best thing we can get, but I shall do so with heavy heart.

I believe that until we can come to the place where we can face squarely and honestly the fact that on the one hand, if we insist on trade and freedom of the seas, we have to expect to sacrifice American men in war; and, on the other hand, if we sincerely want peace we have to face the necessity of great sacrifices of trade in order to remain at peace, and until we can have the courage to take our choice between the two we will not be ready to vote on a genuine and sincere neutrality measure.

I would not question the sincerity of a single Member of this House, but I do submit that many of us have said in our campaigns that we are for neutrality; that we would never vote to send another American soldier across the sea. That is what I said, and I meant it; and because I still mean it I am intensely eager to see us pass legislation here which would prohibit the sale of munitions by Americans at any time and which would embargo every kind of material of war absolutely to any belligerent, not merely on American ships, but on all kinds of ships, in order to try to keep this pledge. Short of this we have, I think, done little toward keeping our country out of war. Short of this we shall end up by sending American men overseas to bleed and die for the sake of trade.

I recognize there is another point of view which is honest and sincere and for which I have the utmost respect. This is the point of view that America should be a crusading nation, protecting her trade everywhere, insisting upon her rights, crusading to protect the weak and to protect the smaller nations, picking out the aggressor nation and siding with the nation that is not the aggressor. But if we are to do this, we should unite hand in hand with other nations that we feel we can trust and embark upon that policy definitely with our eyes open, realizing it leads inevitably to war, and forget the idea of neutrality, and not pretend we are considering it at all. To be consistent, I believe those who hold the foregoing point of view ought to advocate America's joining the League of Nations.

As I say, I have sincere respect for those who hold this idea, and perhaps those people are right; but I hope, on the other hand, that we can find a way in which we can keep America at peace. I have hoped we could develop an "American peace", developing friendships with South America and with the entire Western Hemisphere, building up commerce and trade and a consciousness of neutrality among a group of nations and keeping out of wars in other parts of the world. But I think we must have very strong measures, a good deal stronger than this bill, if we are to be able to do this. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

TRAVEL BY AMERICAN NATIONALS ON BELLIGERENT VESSELS

SEC. 9. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 3 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the maintenance of peace between the United States, and foreign states, or the protection of the lives of citizens of the United States, or the protection of the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or the security of the United States requires that American citizens should refrain from traveling on the vessels of the state or states named in the said proclamation or proclamations, he shall so proclaim, and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of the state or states named in the proclamation or proclamations issued pursuant to section 3 of this act, except under such limitations and in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to a citizen traveling on a vessel whose voyage was begun in advance of the date of the President's proclamation, and who had no opportunity to discontinue his voyage after that date: And provided further, That they shall not apply under 90 days after the date of the President's proclamation to a citizen returning from a foreign state to the United States or to any of its possessions. When, in the President's judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee and others interested if it would not suffice to insert into this bill a declaration to the effect that any American citizen traveling on a belligerent vessel does so at his own risk, rather than make it actually a crime to do so.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, we had this in our bill last year, and after studying it, and with the fear that American citizens would be traveling at their own risk, and be blown up, and then fearing the effect of that on the people of the United States, fearing they would forget about the man traveling at his own risk, we thought it best to put in this other provision, and in the discretion of the President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the chairman of the committee what is the penalty for a man doing this?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Not over 5 years' imprisonment nor more than a ten-thousand-dollar fine—either or nothing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I suppose any protest coming from me at this time will be of little avail, but it seems to me that we are going pretty far when we say to an American citizen that he cannot travel on a belligerent vessel and threaten him with fine and imprisonment up to as much as 5 years for doing so.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. More or less. It may be the minimum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We cannot anticipate what personal crisis may overtake an American citizen. It may be that he may find himself very far from home.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Oh, we have taken care of that in this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. By putting in the provision about the discretion of the President, so that he can give the man permission.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee says that all these things have been taken care of. If that is the fact, there is not much use in the provision.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The President has the discretion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But an American citizen may find himself in an exceedingly difficult situation and he is the only person who may judge of the degree of the difficulty. He may find that he has to go to a foreign country which is a belligerent. He may have to go there for family reasons, he may be compelled to go in ordinary decency; it may be the impending death of a relative, and it may be that the only way he can go there is on a belligerent vessel. He is more than willing to go at his own risk, but potentially, at least, this bill makes him a criminal if he goes. I think we have gone just about far enough in this kind of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado: Page 28, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "vessels of the state or states named in the said proclamation or proclamations" and insert the words "high seas"; line 10, beginning with the word "of", strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 11, 12, and 13 and insert in lieu thereof the words "on the high seas."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the effect of my amendment will be to forbid and prevent Americans from traveling on any vessels on the high seas during the period of the emergency proclaimed by the President. It is not anticipated by me that this amendment will be adopted. It is offered merely for the purpose of enabling me to indicate that this section and section 4 and this entire legislation will not effectuate the desired objective, that it is unworkable, that it is impracticable, that it will not protect American lives or property in case of foreign war, or keep us out of war; but that, on the contrary, it may plunge us into foreign wars; and the implication was carried in the statement which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] made a moment ago with reference to passengers on the high seas, that it was feared the passenger would go on a belligerent vessel and get killed, which would so inflame the country that it might result in war.

I pointed out in the House the other day that it was not the violation of or a failure to observe any of the things in this bill which precipitated us into the World War. We did not get into the World War because American ships were carrying contraband of war or because American citizens were traveling on belligerent vessels. We were precipitated into the World War because Germany, in pursuance of a proclaimed policy, had begun sinking everything that floated on the high seas and had destroyed a number of peaceful unarmed American vessels which carried no contraband or war supplies, and they were sunk without warning on the high seas by German submarines and American citizens murdered, and that precipitated the war.

Now, let us get down to brass tacks. I wish a naval officer, like the gentleman from California [Mr. IZAC], could show us, explain to us, the modus operandi on the high seas during the time of war. We will say that an American vessel leaves an American port, not carrying any contraband or any materials banned by the President, and bound for a neutral port, but that fact cannot be known by belligerent warships. In the old days, ships of war overhauled merchant vessels, brought them to, boarded them, and searched them. If they had contraband of war they took them in tow as prisoners of war. If not, they turned them loose. The policing of the seas in future wars will be carried on by submarines, indeed it was during the World War. It is impractical for submarines to seize and search these vessels. Every vessel that sails from an American port during time of war will be suspected by belligerent powers as having contraband. They cannot board them and examine them, so they will sink them. That is precisely what happened prior to our entry into the World War and plunged us into that war.

It can happen under this bill. It all indicates that in spite of all this legislation we will fail to reach the objective of keeping this country out of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

We have about concluded the most enlightening as well as the most thorough debate indulged in by the House in a long time. The leaders of the majority are to be congratulated on permitting free and open discussion of this vital measure. Of course we are all against war and for peace. However, so long as there is hatred, jealousy, envy, and ambition in the hearts of men, there will be differences of opinion among those men. The same is true of nations. Individuals may enter into agreements never to quarrel and to always submit their disputes to arbitration. When the crucial test comes, however, passion, anger, temper, and thoughtlessness usually prevail, and the mere fact that we have agreed not to fight does not prevent a fight. This being true, no neutrality law, however rigid, will accomplish all that is hoped for. The measure before us is practical in the sense that it expresses the hopes and the aspirations of almost a unanimous American people. It is impractical in the sense, however, that we all know that when a war comes, the country will be controlled largely by the circumstances as they exist at the time. In short, our good intentions, even though expressed in sound, legal language, are ruthlessly brushed aside and we meet the occasion as we see it at the time.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. This will serve notice on the nations of the world that, so far as our Government is concerned, we intend to be neutral in their controversies.

Mr. MICHENER. It will serve notice upon the world that the American people intend to be neutral. I doubt, however, if our people comprehend fully just what neutrality means in case of war between two other nations. The complications arising are so many and so involved that it is almost an impossibility to even contemplate them in advance.

Mr. DOWELL. The American people understand that they want this Government to keep out of war.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; they want to keep out of war, and of that there can be no doubt.

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BERNARD. This bill, in my humble opinion——

Mr. MICHENER. I did not yield for a statement. My time is too limited. I yielded for a question only. I shall not attempt to discuss the details of the McReynolds bill, which has been substituted by the committee for the Pittman bill, which passed the Senate. The bill we pass here today is not going to become the law of the land. Neither will the Pittman bill be enacted into law, but these two bills are going to conference, and the conferees will write the legislation that we will eventually approve. But that legislation must come within the four corners of the two bills.

The principal difference between the Senate and House bills is with reference to restriction of shipments of other materials in addition to war supplies. The Senate bill automatically requires transfer of title to all such material before shipment is made, while the House bill gives the President discretion to determine whether or not this limitation should be placed upon the particular type of materials to be restricted.

In short, if our Government prohibits the sale and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and also denies credit and loans to other nations engaged in war, we will have at least determined in the most positive manner our aversion to war; and have adopted a measure that will be a deterrent, as I view it.

No war can be carried on without munitions and credit. Since the United States has become a world power the nations of the world have always looked to the United States for both credit, munitions, and other implements with which to carry on their wars. If this country is interested in the profits of war—either domestic or foreign—then that is one thing. On the other hand, if this country is interested in doing away with all war, that is another thing. We cannot have our cake and eat it too. Of course, there is temporary prosperity for this country in a great European war, so long as we are not involved. If we are permitted to stand on the side lines, furnish the materials to the warring nations, and receive the financial benefit, we are by these very acts aiding and abetting the warring nations to pursue the very thing we are praying against. So here is a decision that we must make. It is a decision between profit and world peace, and I am sure that if our people could vote on this matter the vast majority would vote for peace and not for profit.

The Pittman bill writes all the rules before the advent of the war. The world is given notice that this country will not in any way attempt to furnish materials of any kind that can be used for war purposes to the warring nations. There can be no misunderstanding. There can be no partiality, and there is no discretion lodged in any agency. I therefore prefer the Pittman bill. This is a far-reaching measure, of course, and some of the implications are not pleasing. Both of these measures provide that we can only do business with any belligerent nation on a cash-and-carry basis. Under no circumstances will we sell any materials of any kind to belligerent nations unless title passes completely in this country and responsibility for removal from the country rests squarely upon the shoulders of the purchaser. It has been said that the passage of this legislation will make the United States the ally of Great Britain in the Atlantic and of Japan in the Pacific, for the reason that these nations control these respective waters, and that if Great Britain is at war she will be able to purchase on a cash-and-carry basis because she will be able to do her own carrying, and that the same will be true of Japan. This is one of the phases of the proposal that I do not like. However, no law is perfect in every particular, and this is but a 2-year experiment.

Again, the opponents of this measure tell us that we are abandoning our time-honored policy of insisting upon the freedom of the seas. There is no question but that the neutrality legislation of a year ago, and as embodied in the pending measure, do abandon that time-honored tradition. Woodrow Wilson said that we entered the World War to make the world safe for democracy. I think we all realize now that we entered the World War primarily because we insisted upon the freedom of the seas, and that the destruction of the Lusitania violated that policy and overnight we were in the midst of the conflagration.

Again that brings us to the question of profit or peace. Had this neutrality law been in effect in 1917, the fact that the Lusitania was carrying munitions of war, and American citizens knowingly and intentionally were passengers on the Lusitania in violation of our law, then it would not have been the duty of this country to enter the war because of the violation of a policy or a law upon which we insisted. Sad as it is, international law, as has been demonstrated so many times in the past, amounts to little when nations get at each other's throat in a war for supremacy.

Like many others here, I have delivered many addresses picturing the American merchant marine and the American Navy on the seven seas of the world protecting American life, American commerce, and American traditions, and I only would that it were possible to continue such a policy without the awful risk of bringing us into a world war at any time, in which dispute this country really has no interest.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, has called our attention to the fact that in more than 100 cases various Presidents of the United States have sent armed forces to foreign lands to protect the rights, the lives, and the property of American citizens. The President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and as our Chief Executive, now has that authority, but I am sure that we do not want any such authority exercised without great caution. One of the principal objections to the McReynolds bill, so far as I am concerned, is the discretionary power lodged in the President. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] in his splendid argument gives as one reason for granting this discretion that—

> You cannot tell what kind of a war it is going to be. You do not know where it is going to be. You do not know whether the nations engaging in the war will have navies or not. You do not know whether it will be hazardous for our people to sail the seas or for our people to sell goods. You have to leave that discretion in the hands of the President to determine as a given situation may arise.

Now, to me the gentleman's statement is the best reason in the world for the passage of the Pittman bill and preventing any of these controversial questions arising which must be settled when the war is on. Clearly, nothing could provoke war quicker than a decision by the President made in favor of one belligerent when possibly that decision might be the deciding factor in the war. Let us write the rules before the game starts, and then let the President act as the referee and enforce the rules. We have already granted too much power to the Executive all along the line, and I hope the time is not far distant when this House will realize where such action is leading us.

This Nation has an almost unbearable tax burden today. We had a similar burden directly after the World War. Yet we thought the country was prosperous during the World War. The truth is that this country loaned the foreign nations something like $16,000,000,000 to carry on the war. With this money the foreign nations bought materials in our country. We borrowed the money from our citizens to loan to those nations, and our citizens received the same money back in payment for the materials sold to the foreign nations. The net result was that when the war was over the foreign nations still owed us the money, and they owe it today. On March 15 every Member in this body filed an income-tax return with the Federal Government, and a part of the tax he paid was required to pay interest on that same money this Government borrowed from its citizens to make us prosperous during the World War. This war business is a vicious circle. The dollars destroyed can be repaid, but if any war is measured by the grief and sorrow and suffering of the people involved, there can be no repayment and no compensation.

In connection with neutrality and war let us not forget that the world is again indulging in a mad armament race. The principal nations in Europe have larger armies than ever in history. Their navies exceed all dreams, and the end is not yet. Our country is following suit. Just realize that this Congress will this year appropriate more than $1,000,000,000 for our national defense. Just remember that that means approximately $8 tax this year for every human being in our land, or $40 for every family. Now, I believe in a proper national defense, and I was pleased to vote the other day for an amendment requesting the President to assemble another world conference looking toward naval disarmament. We had such a conference in 1921. America led the way in that conference and destroyed some good battleships. There was much criticism on the part of some of our citizens. However, years have passed since that conference and an unprejudiced appraisal now convinces us that it postponed for more than 10 years this competitive race among the leading nations. The taxpayers of our country must appreciate that that conference has saved our people around $4,000,000,000 that would have been spent had there been no naval conference. Another conference might do as well and, let us hope, perhaps better.

This is all germane to the subject we are discussing, because war is the main thing against which we are attempting to legislate. I reiterate that this neutrality legislation does involve a change of policy. That is what we want. The policies we have been following have led us into war, and while this bill is undoubtedly faulty in many ways, yet it is headed in the right direction and will tend to isolate us from the quarrels of other nations. Yes; it is harsh in some particulars, and there will be complaint on the part of those who want to manufacture war materials for the sake of the dollars resulting. But by and large, the masses of our people are so opposed to war anywhere in the world that when this law is thoroughly understood it will be accepted with universal accord. Take all the profit out of war, but if we must have war, then let us conscript not only the man power but industry, labor, and agriculture as well. A profitless war all along the line will as a general proposition, I believe, mean no war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

All time has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL MUNITIONS CONTROL BOARD

SEC. 10. (a) The National Munitions Control Board, established by section 2 of the joint resolution (Public Res. No. 67, 74th Cong.) approved August 31, 1935, shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board; the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary of War; the Secretary of the Navy; and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this act or by other law, the administration of this act is vested in the Department of State. The Secretary of State shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of this section as he may deem necessary to carry out its provisions.

The Board shall be convened by the Chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

(b) Every person who engages in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act, whether as an exporter, importer, manufacturer, or dealer, shall register with the Secretary of State his name, or business name, principal place of business, and places of business in the United States, and a list of the arms, ammunition, and implements of war which he manufactures, imports, or exports.

Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $500, unless he manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration, in which case he shall pay a registration fee of $00. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $500 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of more than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal, or a fee of $100 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to refund, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400 to every person who shall have paid a registration fee of $500 pursuant to section 2 of the joint resolution (Public Res. No. 67, 74th Cong.) approved August 31, 1935, who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration.

All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Secretary of State, or any person or persons designated by him, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Secretary of State shall prescribe.

(c) No purchase of arms, ammunition, and implements of war shall be made on behalf of the United States by any officer, executive department, or independent establishment of the Government from any person who shall have failed to register under the provisions of this act.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act to any other country or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any other country any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act without first having obtained a license therefor.

The provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, relating to the sale of ordnance and stores to the Government of Cuba (39 Stat. 619, 643; U. S. C., title 50, sec. 72), are hereby repealed as of December 31, 1937.

Licenses shall be issued to persons who have registered as provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where exportation of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this act or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.

(e) The President is hereby authorized to proclaim upon recommendation of the Board from time to time a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

(f) The Board shall make an annual report to Congress, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. Such reports shall contain such information and data collected by the Board as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the control of trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It shall include a list of all persons required to register under the provisions of this act, and full information concerning the licenses issued hereunder.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: Page 30, line 14, strike out "$00" and insert "$100."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

There is a great demand from the American people for the passage of this legislation. I believe the passage of this legislation will serve notice upon the nations of the world that the United States does not intend to engage in any of their controversies and that the United States intends to do all in its power to preserve peace.

I intend to support this legislation, believing it will aid in preserving peace in the world.

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

I believe I am interested in peace and neutrality as much as any individual in this House, but at the same time I am firmly convinced that the passage of this bill will do more to promote war in the world than any other bill that has ever been presented before this body. If we want to be sincere with ourselves we have to admit that so far our neutrality plan has been in favor of the forces of fascism. We cannot deny that. We all know that Italy and Germany have been sending thousands and thousands of soldiers and enormous quantities of war material to Spain. In spite of that knowledge we have done nothing whatsoever toward placing an arms embargo against Germany or Italy. Why?

I want to warn you that unless we are careful, if we allow ourselves to pass this bill, we will see the forces of fascism being greatly encouraged—bolder, more arrogant, and more bloodthirsty.

One of my esteemed colleagues on the Democratic side alluded to the famous Spanish embargo resolution a little while ago, and said that I was the only one who voted against it. I am very proud of that vote. Let me tell you, however, that if the pending bill passes, Franco is going to be greatly pleased; so will Hitler and Mussolini. As soon as the Spanish embargo resolution was passed, General Franco made the following statement:

President Roosevelt behaved in the manner of a true gentleman. His neutrality legislation stopping the exportation of war materials to either side, the quick manner in which it was passed and carried into effect, is a gesture we nationalists shall never forget.

If we want to please and promote the forces of fascism, let us pass this bill. If, on the other hand, we are interested in the welfare of the American people, if we are actually interested in democracy, liberty, and human progress, then let us defeat this damnable, diabolic, un-American, pro-Fascist measure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PACE: Page 31, line 20, after the word "act", insert "or who has intentionally violated any of the terms, conditions, provisions, or prohibitions of this act."

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, subsection (c), on page 31, which I seek to amend, now provides that the United States Government will not purchase arms and ammunition from a manufacturer who fails to register. This, under the bill, is the only condition under which the Government will not purchase arms from a manufacturer. My amendment merely adds the declaration that neither will the Government purchase arms and ammunition from a manufacturer who intentionally violates the terms and conditions of this act. We have spent hours and days and, including the previous action of the Congress, years in trying to secure a neutrality act. Certainly now we should not permit any munitions manufacturer deliberately to violate the terms of this bill and still be the recipient of orders from the Government.

The sole purpose of the amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to put the munitions manufacturers on notice that if they deliberately and intentionally seek to sell and transport munitions in violation of this act, then our Government will not make purchases from them.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment is not necessary, because munitions manufacturers cannot do business with the Government unless they are licensed, and it is unlawful for them to do business if they are unlicensed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this act where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: Page 34, section 14, line 4, after the word "act", insert "or of any rule or regulation issued pursuant thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the committee substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee substitute, as amended, for the Senate joint resolution.

The committee substitute as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 51, the Neutrality Act of 1937, pursuant to House Resolution 151, he reported the joint resolution back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment is to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

That this act may be cited as the Neutrality Act of 1937.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this act—

(a) The term "United States", when used in a geographical sense, means the continental United States, the Territories and insular possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia.

(b) The term "person" means a natural person, corporation, partnership, organization, or association.

(c) The term "vessel" means every description of watercraft (including aircraft) or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on, under, or over water.

(d) The term "American vessel" means any vessel (including aircraft) documented under the laws of the United States.

(e) The term "vehicle" means every description of carriage (including aircraft) or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on or over land.

(f) The term "Board" means the National Munitions Control Board.

EXPORT OF ARMS, AMMUNITION, AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to any belligerent state, named in the proclamation, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state.

(b) The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to other states as and when they may become involved in such war.

(c) Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state and that such armed conflict is of such a magnitude, or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such state or to any other state for transshipment to, or for use in, the state named in the proclamation.

(d) The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, or implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this section.

(e) When in the judgment of the President the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation or proclamations have ceased to exist, he shall revoke the same and the provisions hereof shall thereupon cease to apply, except with respect to offenses committed, or forfeitures incurred prior to such revocation.

EXPORT OF OTHER ARTICLES AND MATERIALS

SEC. 4 (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 3 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 3, or to a state wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security and preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe, for any American vessel to carry such articles or materials overseas to any belligerent state, or any state wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 3 of this act, or to any other state for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent states or within such state where civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate the articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels to transport.

(b) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations under section 3 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of further restrictions on exportation of commodities from the United States to the belligerents, or to any state wherein civil strife exists, is necessary to promote the security and preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives or commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe to export or transport from the United States to any belligerent state or state wherein civil strife exists named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 3 of this act, or to any other state for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent state or such state wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials other than personal goods and effects whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such articles or materials shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which they are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials.

Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or airship contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under this section to other states as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 3 of this act.

(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under this section.

(e) Any proclamation issued by the President under this section shall apply equally to all belligerents.

(f) Except with respect to prosecutions committed or forfeitures incurred prior to May 1, 1939, this section and all proclamations thereunder shall not be effective after May 1, 1939.

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 5. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation as provided for in section 3 of this act, it shall thereafter during the period of the war or civil strife be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent state or state wherein civil strife exists, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any person acting for or on behalf of such government, or on behalf of any faction of any state wherein civil strife exists, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government or person, or to solicit or receive any contribution for any such government, or political subdivision, or faction, or any person acting for or on behalf of such government or subdivision: Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its nationals, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions. Nothing in this subsection (a) shall be construed to prohibit the solicitation or collection of funds to be used for medical aid and assistance or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering when made for a person, or persons, or organization when not acting for or on behalf of such government or political faction wherein civil strife exists.

(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of the President's proclamation.

(c) Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section or of any regulations issued hereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or agent thereof participating in the violation may be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

(d) When the President shall have revoked his proclamation as provided for in section 3 of this act, the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply.

AMERICAN VESSELS PROHIBITED FROM CARRYING ARMS

SEC. 6. Whenever the President shall issue a proclamation provided for in section 3 of this act, thereafter, until the proclamation shall have been revoked, it shall be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any belligerent state named in such proclamation as being at war or to a state wherein civil strife is proclaimed to exist, or to any other state for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent state or a state wherein civil strife is proclaimed to exist.

Whoever, in violation of the provisions of this section, shall take, attempt to take, or shall authorize, hire, or solicit another to take any such vessel carrying such cargo out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and the arms, ammunition, and implements of war on board shall be forfeited to the United States.

USE OF AMERICAN PORTS AS BASE OF SUPPLY

SEC. 7. (a) Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall have cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry out of a port of the United States, fuel, men, arms, ammunition, implements of war, or other supplies to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state, but the evidence is not deemed sufficient to justify forbidding the departure of the vessel as provided for by section 1, title V, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 217, 221; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 31), and if, in the President's judgment, such action will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interest of the United States and its nationals, or to promote the security or neutrality of the United States, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to require the owner, master, or person in command thereof, before departing from a port of the United States, to give a bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in such amount as he shall deem proper, conditioned that the vessel will not deliver the men, or any part of the cargo, to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state.

(b) If the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall find that a vessel, domestic or foreign, in a port of the United States, has previously cleared from a port of the United States during such war and delivered its cargo or any part thereof to a warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent state, he may prohibit the departure of such vessel during the duration of the war.

SUBMARINES AND ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS

SEC. 8. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States, or of its possessions, by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a foreign state, will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign states, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any such submarine or armed merchant vessel to enter a port or the territorial waters of the United States or to depart therefrom, except under such conditions and subject to such limitations as the President may prescribe. When, in his judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

TRAVEL BY AMERICAN NATIONALS ON BELLIGERENT VESSELS

SEC. 9. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 3 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the maintenance of peace between the United States and foreign states, or the protection of the lives of citizens of the United States, or the protection of the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or the security of the United States requires that American citizens should refrain from traveling on the vessels of the state or states named in the said proclamation or proclamations, he shall so proclaim, and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of the state or states named in the proclamation or proclamations issued pursuant to section 3 of this act, except under such limitations and in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to a citizen traveling on a vessel whose voyage was begun in advance of the date of the President's proclamation, and who had no opportunity to discontinue his voyage after that date: And provided further, That they shall not apply under 90 days after the date of the President's proclamation to a citizen returning from a foreign state to the United States or to any of its possessions. When, in the President's judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

NATIONAL MUNITIONS CONTROL BOARD

SEC. 10. (a) The National Munitions Control Board, established by section 2 of the joint resolution (Public Res. No. 67, 74th Cong.) approved August 31, 1935, shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board; the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary of War; the Secretary of the Navy; and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this act, or by other law, the administration of this act is vested in the Department of State. The Secretary of State shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of this section as he may deem necessary to carry out its provisions.

The Board shall be convened by the chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

(b) Every person who engages in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act, whether as an exporter, importer, manufacturer, or dealer, shall register with the Secretary of State his name, or business name, principal place of business, and places of business in the United States, and a list of the arms, ammunition, and implements of war which he manufactures, imports, or exports.

Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $500, unless he manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration, in which case he shall pay a registration fee of $100. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $500 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of more than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal, or a fee of $100 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to refund, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400 to every person who shall have paid a registration fee of $500 pursuant to section 2 of the joint resolution (Public Res. No. 67, 74th Cong.) approved August 31, 1935, who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration.

All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Secretary of State, or any person or persons designated by him, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Secretary of State shall prescribe.

(c) No purchase of arms, ammunition, and implements of war shall be made on behalf of the United States by any officer, executive department, or independent establishment of the Government from any person who shall have failed to register under the provisions of this act.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act to any other country, or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any other country any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act without first having obtained a license therefor.

The provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, relating to the sale of ordnance and stores to the Government of Cuba (39 Stat. 619, 643; U. S. C., title 50, sec. 72), are hereby repealed as of December 31, 1937.

Licenses shall be issued to persons who have registered as provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where exportation of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this act or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.

(e) The President is hereby authorized to proclaim upon recommendation of the Board from time to time a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

(f) The Board shall make an annual report to Congress, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. Such reports shall contain such information and data collected by the Board as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the control of trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It shall include a list of all persons required to register under the provisions of this act, and full information concerning the licenses issued hereunder.

EXCEPTIONS—AMERICAN REPUBLICS

SEC. 11. This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

REGULATIONS BY THE PRESIDENT

SEC. 12. The President may, from time to time, promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this act; and he may exercise any power or authority conferred on him by this act through such officer or officers, or agency or agencies, as he shall direct.

PENALTIES

SEC. 13. Any arms, ammunition, or implements of war exported or attempted to be exported from the United States in violation of any of the provisions of this act and any vessel or vehicle containing the same shall be subject to the provisions of sections 1 to 8, inclusive, title 6, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 223–225; U. S. C., title 22, secs. 238–245).

In the case of the forfeiture of any arms, ammunition, or implements of war by reason of a violation of this act, no public or private sale shall be required; but such arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be delivered to the Secretary of War for such use or disposal thereof as shall be approved by the President of the United States.

SEC. 14. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this act or of any rule or regulation issued pursuant thereto where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF THIS ACT

SEC. 15. If any of the provisions of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

AUTHORIZATIONS FOR APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 16. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act.

REPEAL

SEC. 17. The joint resolution (Public Res. No. 67, 74th Cong.) approved August 31, 1935, as amended and extended by the joint resolution (Public Res. No. 74, 74th Cong.) approved February 29, 1936, is hereby repealed, but such repeal shall not affect the validity of any proclamation, rule, regulation, certificate of registration, or license, issued pursuant to that resolution.

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution to maintain the neutrality of the United States in the event of war between or among foreign nations, and for other purposes."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were—ayes 196, noes 41.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. FISH. I am, Mr. Speaker; in its present form.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FISH moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to the committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 20, after line 17, add a new paragraph, to be known as paragraph (f), to read as follows:

"It shall be unlawful to export or attempt to export or cause to be exported arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States in time of peace, as well as in time of war."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 275, not voting 39, as follows:

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Chair a question with respect to straightening out a vote. A gentleman came in and thought he had voted in place of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. I am not sure whether the vote was so recorded or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] did not vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The title of the Senate joint resolution was amended.

CAVELIER DE LA SALLE

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend, at this point in the RECORD, a brief announcement with reference to the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Cavelier de La Salle, who discovered the Mississippi Valley.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, a quarter of a thousand years ago tomorrow, March 19, 1687, at or near Navasota, Tex., one of the greatest empire builders of all time met his death. I refer to René Robert Cavelier, Sieur de La Salle.

His richest legacy, which he left to his king and to posterity, was the Louisiana Territory, which he established by discovery and exploration.

The millions who live in the valley of the imperial Mississippi, as well as in other sections of the United States, and Canada and his native France, can only profit if they pause to reflect upon the hardships he endured, the courage that spurred him on, and the Christian faith that sustained him. It is doubtful if any man who ever trod this continent excelled him in "the arduous greatness of things done."

The people of southern Michigan and northern Indiana take an especial interest in perpetuating his memory, for it was near what is now South Bend that he first crossed over from the St. Lawrence Basin to the Mississippi watershed on December 5, 1679.

It is on that famous portage that the La Salle memorial committee of South Bend hopes to see some day erected an international shrine in his memory. I trust that the Congress of the United States may aid in that undertaking.

For what now follows I am indebted to Dr. L. A. Rausch, chairman of that committee:

On Friday, March 19, 1937, the schools of the United States, Canada, and France have been asked to unite in the commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of René Robert Cavelier, Sieur de La Salle.

La Salle, as this scholarly explorer is known in history, was born to wealthy parents in 1643, and spent his childhood in his native city of Rouen, on the river Seine in France. Here, where he could watch the ships coming from and going to the sea, he acquired a taste for business and adventure which in later life caused him to renounce his intention to become a Jesuit priest, and set his course to America in search of a passage to China.

La Salle's plan was to explore into the heart of the American continent, and establish forts as preliminary steps in a vast program of colonization, which was to protect the water route that he assumed led to the Pacific Ocean and the Orient.

On all his important journeys, La Salle was accompanied by priests, the ministers of his church. Where La Salle built a fort, there also he erected a chapel for the worship of his God. His high moral standard, which he imposed on those who traveled with him, caused many to desert.

It was La Salle, the diplomat, who in the glamorous court of Louis the XIV, persuaded the King and his counselors to grant La Salle the right to explore and colonize the new continent.

Again it was La Salle, the diplomat, who in the wilderness persuaded the Illinois and Miami chiefs to discontinue their feuds and join him as subjects of France, thereby obtaining without the force of arms, security for his explorations and colonizations. In the presence of the Council Oak, which still stands near the portage used by La Salle, the pipe of peace was smoked by white and red men alike, a symbol of friendship and loyalty.

The calumet is truly symbolic of La Salle, for he believed in peaceful progress. However, he also believed that ability to defend one's self often prevented undesirable attack, so we find La Salle always able to defend his party with force of arms if necessary, showing at all times a courage built upon preparedness, yet preferring the peaceful council and calumet rather than a decision through the shedding of blood.

Twenty years in the wilderness demonstrated all the fine and noble qualities of the man La Salle. His several journeys claimed for France that vast territory of the Mississippi Valley, which La Salle named Louisiana, and which later was given by France to the then young United States. It was La Salle who discovered and named the Ohio "The Beautiful River." It was La Salle who first journeyed from a source of the Mississippi, the Kankakee River, to its mouth on the Gulf of Mexico. It was La Salle who by accident established a colony in what is now the State of Texas in the region of Matagorda Bay.

Disaster followed disaster throughout the career of La Salle, but an unconquerable spirit caused him to carry on when less sturdy souls would have given up. The storm on the Gulf of Mexico, which caused La Salle to miss the mouth of the Mississippi, forced the establishment of his last colony on the Matagorda River. But, in his characteristic manner, La Salle set about to rediscover the river he had missed, in an effort to reach his Canadian estates, with the intention of starting again.

It was while his party was on this back-track that a disgruntled follower, hiding in the underbrush along the trail, shot La Salle dead as La Salle was hastening to the relief of another member of his party who was in distress.

Thus an untimely end was brought to the career of the peer of French explorers. And his body, stripped of all valuables, was tossed into the bushes, left to an unknown fate beside an unmarked trail near one of the rivers in Texas on the morning of March 19, 1687.

The Council Oak and the La Salle Portage Trail in South Bend, Ind., mark the gateway to the West—the shortest portage between the Great Lakes and Mississippi waterways—which was used often by La Salle. Here was consummated the most important treaty of La Salle's wilderness career. So it is fitting, on this the quarto-millenial anniversary of the death of La Salle, that we as a nation promptly continue to completion the proposed international shrine to La Salle to be erected overlooking the La Salle Portage and the council site.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks delivered today a copy of a brief editorial upon which my remarks were based.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he knows that it is contrary to the rules of the House to put editorials in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the request?

Mr. RICH. I am not objecting, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on Monday next after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I must object, because we have set aside that day, which was the day for the Committee on the District of Columbia in order that we might take up an appropriation bill and have general debate. I am sure the gentleman could secure time in general debate on that day.

Mr. RICH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may have the time on Tuesday.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to the request because the bill will be read that day under the 5-minute rule. If the gentleman wants to change his request to Thursday, I shall have no objection.

Mr. RICH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I submit the request for Wednesday.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is Calendar Wednesday, and I shall have to object to that.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] whether he is going to permit any other Member of the House to have any time between now and Thursday?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not.

Mr. RICH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 15 minutes on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANZETTA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a statement which I made before a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture, which has under consideration the bill H. R. 5326.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including therein a recent speech of the Postmaster General of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] may address the House for 15 minutes tomorrow following the special orders already entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I was called out of the Chamber during the roll call on the final passage of the neutrality bill and was unable to return before the roll call was concluded. Had I been present I would have voted "aye", and I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD may disclose this fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SACKS, is still unavoidably detained. If present, he would have voted "aye" on the passage of the neutrality bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my extension of remarks certain excerpts from the report of the Monetary Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

CONTROL OF INSECT PESTS OR PLANT DISEASES

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. JONES, NELSON, and HOPE.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PATRICK, for Thursday and Friday, on account of official business.

To Mr. MCFARLANE, for Thursday and Friday, on account of official business.

To Mr. CURLEY, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 272. Joint resolution to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to accept title for the United States to certain real property to be donated by Mr. Henry Ford and wife for Veterans' Administration facility purposes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, March 19, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

1217. By Mr. SUTPHIN: Resolution by the Southern Ocean County Democratic Club of New Jersey, supporting the President in his plan to reform the Supreme Court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1218. By Mr. TEIGAN: Petition of the Minnesota State Legislature, urging passage of the Frazier bill for the refinancing of farm mortgages through the Federal farm-loan system, the Federal Reserve Banking System, and the Postal-Savings Depository System, and creating a board of agriculture to supervise the same; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE

FRIDAY, MARCH 19, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, who hast watched above us while we slept and from the night hast called another day, be with us through the hours that stretch before us all untried, and fill them with such noble thoughts and care for the common weal as will grave upon each brow a look of patient power. Be near to every heart here and throughout the world this day, O Savior of mankind, and shelter with the shadow of Thy cross of love all those who are so overborne with grief, and may the Nation's sympathy be unto them the earnest and the pledge of Thine own tenderness.

Blessed Christ, who in the long ago didst take little children into Thine arms to comfort and bless them there, open our eyes that, looking beyond the horizon of earth's sorrows, we may see Thee as Thou art and hear again Thy gentle voice saying, "Suffer the little children to come unto me for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, March 17, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. In order that we may be assured of the presence of a quorum, I ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Pepper
Andrews	Copeland	King	Pittman
Ashurst	Davis	La Follette	Pope
Austin	Dieterich	Lee	Radcliffe
Bachman	Duffy	Lewis	Reynolds
Bailey	Ellender	Lodge	Robinson
Barkley	Frazier	Logan	Russell
Bilbo	George	Lonergan	Schwartz
Black	Gerry	Lundeen	Schwellenbach
Bone	Gibson	McAdoo	Sheppard
Borah	Gillette	McGill	Stelwer
Bridges	Green	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Brown, Mich.	Guffey	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Bulow	Hale	Maloney	Townsend
Burke	Harrison	Minton	Tydings
Byrd	Hatch	Moore	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hayden	Murray	Van Nuys

Clark	Johnson, Calif.	Overton

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are necessarily absent on public business; while the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. BULOW. I announce that my colleague the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is detained from the Senate because of a death in his family.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

THE DISASTER AT NEW LONDON, TEX.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 2 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the whole country has been shocked by a terrible tragedy which occurred yesterday in the great State which I in part have the honor to represent in this body. An explosion which wiped out the lives of hundreds of innocent school children at New London, Tex., produced a holocaust which staggers the imagination and arouses the grief and sympathy of the whole Nation.

In this tragic hour may I pay tribute to the American Red Cross and to the United States Army, both of which acted with promptitude and efficiency in extending all aid that is within their power and resources. It is also a matter of pride that the people of Texas and her public authorities have quickly responded to the necessities of the situation and have provided corps of physicians, nurses, and hospital facilities to care for the maimed, wounded, and injured. The hearts and sympathies of the people of Texas are profoundly moved by this stupendous calamity. I know that their feelings are universally shared by the people of America.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I join my colleague [Mr. CONNALLY] in deploring the calamity which occurred in Texas yesterday. It was one of the major disasters of history, terrible beyond every power of expression. The Nation is bowed in grief today, and I feel that I speak advisedly when I say that the entire Senate is in deepest sympathy with the stricken families, the stricken community, and the stricken State.

REORGANIZATION OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY—NOTICE OF RADIO ADDRESS BY FORMER JUSTICE CLARK

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, probably no subject has aroused more general public interest than that relating to the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary. Various viewpoints are being presented in public addresses, in magazines, and in newspapers. Almost unaccountably, to me at least, the issues involved in the plan presented by the President have overshadowed other topics discussed in the two Houses of the Congress and in the country at large.

Recently one of the Justices of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice McReynolds, expressed his views on the subject in a public speech and quite naturally they were given widespread publicity.

As I now recall, the only living former member of the Supreme Court resigned from the bench in order to devote his time to the cultivation of public opinion in behalf of international peace. He is Mr. John Hessin Clark, a lawyer of great learning, a gentleman of refinement, a scholar of renown. He is expected to deliver a radio address next Monday evening, March 22, at 9 o'clock, eastern standard time, on the relation of the President's proposal to the Federal Constitution.

I take the liberty of making this announcement in order that Senators and others who are interested in hearing what he may have to say will be apprised of his intention to speak and have the opportunity of hearing the eminent jurist.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting sundry nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. JONES, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. HOPE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 28. An act to authorize the deportation of aliens who secured preference-quota or nonquota visas through fraud by contracting marriage solely to fraudulently expedite admission to the United States, and for other purposes;

H. R. 29. An act to declare that a citizen of the United States who votes in a political election in a foreign state or who participates in certain voting abroad to determine sovereignty of foreign territory shall lose United States citizenship and nationality; and

H. R. 3679. An act to restrict habitual commuting of aliens from foreign contiguous territory to engage in skilled or unskilled labor or employment in continental United States.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 361. An act to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N. Dak.;

S. 996. An act to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between the towns of Decatur, Nebr., and Onawa, Iowa;

S. 997. An act to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the cities of South Sioux City, Nebr., and Sioux City, Iowa;

H. R. 1096. An act for the relief of Michael E. Sullivan; and

H. J. Res. 272. Joint resolution to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to accept title for the United States to certain real property to be donated by Mr. Henry Ford and wife for Veterans' Administration facility purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, March 19, 1937.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

Under the order of the Senate of the 17th instant, Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, filed with me, as Secretary of the Senate, on the 18th instant, the bill (H. R. 5232) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, with amendments and an accompanying report (No. 203) thereon.

Very truly yours,

EDWIN A. HALSEY, Secretary.

COOS BAY WAGON ROAD GRANT LANDS, OREGON

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation relating to the revested Oregon & California Railroad and reconveyed Coos Bay Wagon Road grant lands, situated in the State of Oregon, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK AND MONUMENT, ARIZ.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to revise the boundary of the Grand Canyon National Park in the State of Arizona; to abolish the Grand Canyon National Monument; to restore certain lands to the public domain, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

LIMITS OF TOWN OF ST. THOMAS, VIRGIN ISLANDS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, copy of an ordinance adopted by the Municipal Council of St. Thomas and St. John on November 23, 1936, to extend the limits of the town of St. Thomas, together with a justification therefor, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, responding to Senate Resolution 82 (agreed to on the 17th ultimo), calling for certain information concerning injunctions or judgments issued or rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, and embodying a statement showing the extent and manner in which operations under the Department of the Interior have been affected, as well as a statement showing the instances in which there has been a conflict among the inferior Federal courts with respect to such cases, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 37).

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting in response to Senate Resolution 82, a statement of all cases in which injunctions affecting the Department of Agriculture have been issued by the Federal courts since March 4, 1933, excepting cases relating to processing taxes under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as to which the Department of Justice will submit a statement, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 38).

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, submitting a statement in response to Senate Resolution 82 (agreed to on the 17th ultimo), calling for certain information concerning injunctions or judgments issued or rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. No. 39).

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States that it is the sense of the members of the Minnesota Legislature that the Government of the United States should perform its solemn promise and duty and place American agriculture on the basis of equality with other industries by providing an adequate system of credit, and that adequate legislation to that end should be adopted at the earliest possible date

Whereas the farmers throughout the entire United States have lost and are losing their lands and chattels through inability to refinance loans and their property because of high interest rates and low prices of agricultural commodities; and

Whereas agriculture is the basic industry of this country, and there can be no sound business prosperity unless the business of agriculture is placed on a sound basis and on an equal basis with other industries; and

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the Senate of the United States, known as the Farmers' Farm Relief Act, commonly called the Frazier bill, to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness, and to encourage and promote agriculture, commerce, and industry by establishing an efficient credit system, through which the unjust and unequal burdens placed upon agriculture during the period of price fixing and deflation may be lightened by providing for the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest through the Federal farm-loan system, the Federal Reserve Banking System, and the Postal Savings Depository System, and creating a board of agriculture to supervise the same; and

Whereas this bill is a sound economic measure, designed to remedy the inequalities under which agriculture is now laboring: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urgently petitioned to enact the said bill into law, and that the President of the United States be urged to approve said measure after its passage; be it further

Resolved, That the Minnesota Members of the United States Senate and the Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota be, and they are hereby, petitioned and most earnestly urged to use their best efforts to bring about a speedy enactment of said legislation; be it further

Resolved, That a duly authenticated copy of this resolution be presented to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully represent that—

Whereas under the Federal Farm Loan Act and the Farm Credit Act of 1935 deficiency judgments are taken on mortgage securities on loans; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Seventy-fifth Congress Senate bill No. 816, by Senator POPE, a bill introduced on January 14, 1937, which amends the Federal Farm Loan Act and Farm Credit Act of 1935, adding a new section, no. 13, to provide as follows: "No deficiency judgment shall be taken in the foreclosure of any first mortgage obtained as security for any loan: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon hereby does petition the Congress of the United States to enact this proposed amendment into law; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Oregon is hereby directed to send a copy of this memorial to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, Washington, D. C., a copy to Senator POPE, of Idaho, a copy to each Senator and Representative from the State of Oregon, and also a copy hereof to the speaker of the house and the president of the senate of each State legislature in the United States which shall convene during the year 1937.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent:

Whereas weeds constitute one of the greatest agricultural problems in the United States and constitute the greatest source of agricultural loss, with the possible exception of soil erosion; and

Whereas a conference representing five different upper Mississippi Valley States estimated an annual crop loss of $1,000,000,000 because of weeds; and

Whereas the State of Idaho, after large expenditures previous to 1936, engaged in a $2,000,000 weed-control program for that State in 1936, three-fourths of which was financed with Federal money; and

Whereas the Northwestern States, including Utah, Montana, Wyoming, Oregon, and Washington are taking steps in the matter of weed control; and

Whereas 57 percent of the land in Oregon is in Federal ownership; and

Whereas the weed problem has been recognized by the three farm organizations of Oregon, namely, the Oregon State Grange, the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, and the Farm Bureau Federation as of major importance, and they have passed resolutions favoring National, State, county, and individual weed control; and

Whereas the Oregon State Planning Board has reported an annual loss of $1,500,000 from a limited number of perennial noxious weeds in Oregon alone and have recommended additional research work, additional control work; and

Whereas it is the consensus of opinion of these bodies that noxious weeds are gaining ground rapidly, that the control measures are inadequate, and that more research is needed and that the weed problem is no longer an individual problem but a public problem: Be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That the legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon hereby does petition the Congress of the United States:

1. To enact H. R. 4009 authorizing an appropriation of $50,000,000 to be apportioned among the various States of the United States, and does hereby endorse this bill and recommends its enactment.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to forward one copy of this memorial to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, and to each Member of the Oregon delegation in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the thirty-ninth legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully represent that:

Whereas there are approximately 250 mail carriers in the State of Oregon, known as "star route carriers"; and

Whereas there are thousands of such carriers in the Western States of these United States; and

Whereas such star route mail carriers are contract carriers and their contracts are based upon competitive bidding, which, during the past 4 years has been exceptionally low and such carriers are underpaid; and

Whereas the said star route mail carriers should be compensated for their faithful service during the past 4 years under exceptionally adverse conditions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That this thirty-ninth legislative assembly of the State of Oregon does hereby petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States to pass the bill now pending before the Congress of the United States providing for the extension of the contracts of such carriers for the period of 4 years; and be it further

Resolved, That this thirty-ninth legislative assembly of the State of Oregon does hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to so amend such bill as to increase the compensation now paid to such carriers; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the State of Oregon, is hereby directed to send a copy of this memorial to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, Washington, D. C., a copy to each Representative and Senator from the State of Oregon, also a copy hereof to the speaker of the house and president of the senate of each State legislature in the United States which shall convene during the year 1937.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Delegates of the State of Maryland, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A house resolution commending the President for his message to Congress, recommending changes in the Federal judiciary

Whereas at the recent election, the President received an overwhelming vote of confidence and an endorsement of his program for the economic recovery of the country; and

Whereas during the past 4 years he has devoted his time and given his strength for the purpose of bringing relief to the needy, employment to the unemployed, and economic recovery for the entire country; and

Whereas it has been recognized for years that changes should be made in the Federal judiciary, in order to expedite the trial of cases, and especially appeals from lower courts involving constitutional questions; and

Whereas it is the general practice of the States to retire judges when they reach the age of 70, thereby enabling the courts to function more efficiently; and

Whereas the President is proposing to place the Federal courts on a more efficient basis and should be supported by all those who want to see the courts administered in an efficient and expeditious manner: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Delegates of Maryland, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urgently requested to act promptly and favorably on the proposals submitted by the President for improving the judicial branch of the Government; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the House of Delegates of Maryland be, and he is hereby, directed to send a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Congress of the United States from the State of Maryland.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Senate Resolution 56

Resolution memorializing Congress to support the recommendations of Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, with reference to the Federal judiciary

Whereas the recommendations of the President to Congress with reference to the structure, the method of selecting the personnel, and the procedure of the Federal courts, if carried into effect, would insure a more efficient and higher quality of administration of justice in our Federal courts generally; and

Whereas it is apparent that such reorganization is much needed and will further the ends of justice and will promote the general welfare and expedite the business before the said judiciary; and

Whereas in respect to the Supreme Court of the United States to bring to the Court the invaluable asset of enlightened experience of fresh views, closer contacts with and more sympathetic understanding of current economic, social, and political operations and their relations to the exercise by Congress of its legitimate powers under the Constitution of the United States and retain the invaluable experience of the older Justices of the Court: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully memorialized to assist the President of the United States, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in accomplishing the reorganization of the Supreme Court and the Federal judiciary to the end that our Federal courts may deserve continued respect and confidence of the American people and serve their constitutional purpose as an indispensable instrumentality in the whole life of the Republic; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the United States Senators, and Members of Congress from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a petition (in the form of a resolution) of 102 citizens, being members of the Legislature of the State of Washington, praying for the enactment of old-age pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by Local Lodge, No. 547, Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, of Lakeland, Fla., and Moving Picture Machine Operators' Local, No. 249, International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employees, of Dallas, Tex., favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Division No. 38, A. O. H., of Pittsburgh, Pa., favoring the enactment of the so-called McCarran-Mead bill, being the bill (S. 70) providing postal employees' longevity pay, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the American Legion Auxiliary Capitol Post, No. 1, of Topeka, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation to prevent profiteering in time of war, and to equalize the burdens of war, and thus provide for the national defense, and promote peace, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GIBSON presented a memorial of several citizens of Island Pond, Vt., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by a meeting of voters and citizens of the town of Rupert, Vt., protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or any other legislation of a similar character, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented eight memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or any other legislation of a similar character, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented three memorials, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by citizens of Deerfield, Franklin County, Mass., in annual town meeting assembled, protesting against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 29) to promote the safety of employees and travelers on railroads by requiring common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to install, inspect, test, repair, and maintain block-signal systems, interlocking, highway grade-crossing protective devices, automatic train-stop, train-control, cab-signal devices, and other appliances, methods, and systems intended to promote the safety of railroad operation, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 222) thereon.

SAFETY IN THE AIR—PRINTING OF SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have several matters from the Committee on Commerce to present to the Senate. First, through my own misunderstanding, there was not printed in the RECORD the supplementary report of the Committee on Safety in the Air submitted by me at the session of Wednesday last. This is of interest to the Senate because of the loss of our late colleague Mr. Cutting. I ask that the supplementary report be printed in full in the RECORD as presented by me.

There being no objection, the report (S. Rept. 185) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, on June 7, 1935, was directed by resolution (S. Res. 146, 74th Cong., 1st sess.) to investigate certain airplane accidents in interstate air commerce and to make suitable recommendations thereon. The resolution reads as follows:

"Whereas an airplane owned by Transcontinental Western Air, Inc., while engaged in interstate air commerce was wrecked near Macon, in the State of Missouri, on the 6th day of May 1935, resulting in the death of five persons, among whom was an honored member of this body, Hon. Bronson M. Cutting; and

"Whereas it is imperative that life and property transported through interstate air commerce should be accorded the greatest degree of safety obtainable through the use of every reasonable safeguard; and

"Whereas it is essential, in order to protect life and property in transportation through the air, that a thorough and searching inquiry should be made into the causes of the wreck referred to and into the efforts, if any, for the prevention of accidents of like character, and the safeguards, if any, provided both by the companies engaged in interstate air commerce and the precautions and safeguards, if any, required by governmental agencies; and

"Whereas such investigation and the knowledge to be derived therefrom are necessary to enable the Congress to adopt legislation:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, or a subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate fully and thoroughly the said wreck of the airplane owned by Transcontinental Western Air, Inc., which occurred on the 6th day of May 1935, near Macon, in the State of Missouri, and any other accidents or wrecks of airplanes engaged in interstate air commerce in which lives have been lost; and to investigate fully and thoroughly interstate air commerce, the precautions and safeguards provided therein, both by those engaged in such interstate air transportation and by officials or departments of the United States Government; and to investigate fully and thoroughly the activities of those entrusted by the Government with the protection of property and life by air transportation, and the degree, adequacy, and efficiency of supervision by any agency of Government, including inspection and frequency thereof, and to take testimony in all aspects in relation to any of the matters herein indicated and in relation to any subject related thereto; be it further

"Resolved, That the said Committee on Commerce, or the subcommittee thereof appointed for the purpose, shall determine what legislation, if any, shall be adopted in the interest of safety of life and property transported in interstate air commerce, and what legislation, if any, shall be adopted to prevent accidents in the air and to provide appropriate safeguards for their prevention; and be it further

"Resolved, That for the purposes of this resolution, such committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, sit, and act at such times and places during the sessions or recesses of the Senate during the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses until a final report is submitted; to employ such counsel, experts, clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, take testimony, and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee, not to exceed the sum of $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman."

Acting under the authority of this resolution, the committee reports as follows:

SCOPE OF THE SURVEY

This committee is the seventeenth committee or board which, during the past 17 years, has studied the major problems of and considered possible improvements in American aeronautics. The present study has extended over a period of 20 months.

The general subject of safety in the air has many ramifications, and almost every phase of aeronautical development involves safety in one way or another. In order to make its survey complete and its recommendations of practical and constructive value, your committee has found it both necessary and desirable to study the entire history of American aeronautics.

A number of months were spent in taking the testimony of numerous aeronautical experts, representative of the best available thought. This testimony covers several thousand printed pages and an even larger volume of exhibits. Representatives of the committee visited and studied the aeronautical situation at many points and along a number of our Federal airways. The committee made known its willingness to hear any person desiring to submit views pertaining to the subject under investigation. Reports of our predecessors, the 16 committees and boards mentioned, were carefully studied so that your committee might profit from their investigations and conclusions.

In view of our studies and experiences we feel we are prepared to advise the Senate as to the present needs in aviation. We shall venture to recommend certain changes which we believe are essential to the promotion of air safety.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

The United States is the only great nation where progress in aeronautics has resulted, not from the biddings of war offices but from the advantages of competition and freedom resulting from peace. In fact, there has been a complete divorcement between military and civil aeronautics. Speaking generally, the industry merits admiration and support. What has been accomplished, especially in scheduled air-line activities, is little short of miraculous.

Perhaps because of the aforementioned divorcement there has circulated in this country a belief that American aeronautics, both military and civil, is inferior to that of the rest of the world. Generally speaking, that conception is not well founded. In air-line operation and in the qualitative production and standardization of motors, planes, and equipment of above-average quality, we excel. In the performance of certain experimental military aircraft due to the availability of an approved and proven higher-horsepower engine, some other countries excel.

Our Federal Government has developed a series of domestic airways, forming a network which covers much of the continental United States. As is the case with facilities designed to aid coastwise and inland waterway navigation, the Federal Government has installed and owns most of the essential parts of the air-navigation facilities. One important factor in the successful operation of civil aeronautics has been the aid given by the Government in the way of increasing radio facilities.

The operations of our scheduled air lines, including the transporting of mail by air, have developed into the world's most highly successful systems. American commercial aeronautics is supreme throughout the world when judged by any of the accepted standards of appraisal. This is true whether we consider it in terms of numbers of miles of organized air routes; miles flown per day; passengers, mail, and express carried per day; infrequency of accidents to planes and equipment; numbers of commercial airplanes in operation; numbers of the personnel operating them; comfort and convenience of operation; or the capacity for production of airplanes and equipment. A careful examination of the accident records of our scheduled air lines indicates that, in this particular also, America leads the world; flying by American scheduled air lines is safer than similar flying in other countries. In every important respect the United States leads in civil and commercial aeronautics.

We can say these things in all truth. But because they are true, the Government is not absolved from the duty to leave no stone unturned in promoting greater safety. Much remains undone.

COMMITTEE'S PRELIMINARY REPORT

A preliminary report (Rept. No. 2455, 74th Cong., 2d sess.) was submitted on June 20, 1936, by this committee. It presented (a) our findings relating to the cause of the airplane accident at Atlanta, Mo., on May 6, 1935, in which our colleague Senator Bronson M. Cutting and four other persons were killed; and (b) certain recommendations for changes in the personnel of the Bureau of Air Commerce, Department of Commerce, charged with the administration of the Federal provisions for safety in the air.

We regret that full use of the pertinent facts and voluminous evidence produced by your committee's thorough investigation into the subject of safety in the air has not yet been made. All of our findings, particularly those included in our preliminary report, have been made available all this time.

SCIENTIFIC DEVELOPMENT

Safety and progress in aeronautics are obtained by the proper coordination of a number of factors. The first one is to make certain of the continued scientific development of the industry and all its parts.

In order that our scientific basis of design and construction may not fall behind the rest of the world, it is essential to keep up to date the laboratory equipment of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. It seeks to advance the science of aeronautics through its coordination of fundamental aeronautical research activities wherever undertaken in America. With the far-sighted support of Congress it has developed at Langley Field, Va., research laboratories which, until recently, have been unexcelled.

A few years ago its equipment was in advance of the rest of the world. But foreign countries have copied our equipment and, in some respects, improved upon it. We would make greater progress were we able to rebuild this equipment in the light of present-day knowledge. Accuracy of design and increased safety depend upon the research findings of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. Its request for more modern equipment should be approved if America is expected to build larger, faster, and safer airplanes.

It is not only sound but also essential that the Government strive for advancement in scientific research into the problem of safety in flight. This is the sort of research that is vitally needed for our national defense, and which is so costly no private body could be expected to engage in it.

We do not consider it sound practice for the Government to do either experimental or development work in matériel. That should be left to industry. But funds ought to be provided by Congress to the appropriate Government departments for the purchase of worth-while results, the fruit of industry's experimentation and development.

Specifically, the Bureau of Air Commerce, as we see it, should not engage in scientific, experimental, or development work in its own shops or laboratories. It should confine itself to coordination, stimulation, and direction of technical advance and safety in private industry. Fundamental research into the problems of flight being within the province of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, the other steps should be taken by private enterprise. Of all the factors contributing to progress in these two fundamentals, techinque and safety, the actual competition of the air lines in their efforts to afford better service to the public has been by far the greatest.

Mindful of this, and yet appreciative of the fact that the air lines should undertake nothing of an experimental nature in actual flight where the lives of passengers are involved, we are recommending that provision be made for the coordination[1] of flight testing of ground and air equipment and of fuel oils and lubricants by the Department of Commerce. The actual work should be done by the air lines flying without passengers, but receiving regular mail allowances. This experimental work in flights should not be counted in computing by the Interstate Commerce Commission fair rates of payments to be made by the Postmaster General.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

Aeronautics is a rapidly advancing branch of engineering science; its development is dependent upon the conduct of fundamental scientific research pertaining to the problems of flight. We are fortunate in having in the United States a scientific organization devoted to this research. The product of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics laboratories has been the chief factor in the recent remarkable development, not only of American aircraft, but of aircraft the world over. Its work covers (a) the present trend of design and construction toward larger airplanes of higher speeds; (b) America's present aircraft procurement programs for the national defense; and (c) the current demands of (1) national defense, (2) the air-transport industry, and (3) the private flyer for still greater plane efficiency and safety.

It will be seen how extremely important it is that the research facilities of the National Advisory Committee be encouraged and increased. Such support is essential for the development of greater performance, efficiency, and safety. Likewise, in the public interest, the cost of production should be reduced to the minimum so that the most accurate design data attainable shall be made available to American aircraft designers and manufacturers. Such plans should be drawn in the light of actual flight performance, which has not always been possible with existing research facilities.

Foreign nations, especially Italy, Germany, England, Soviet Russia, and France, have recently copied and improved upon American research equipment. Those countries are planning extensions of their research facilities, which within 2 years, unless corrective action be taken without delay, will enable them to surpass the United States in certain technical development of aircraft. Under the spur of tremendous aircraft building programs, an international race in the field of aeronautical research is on. America's leadership is seriously threatened. It is in the interest of our national defense, and also of American commercial aeronautics, that we should not lose our national superiority by permitting our technical development of aircraft to lag. The only way to prevent this is for us constantly to provide modern research facilities for the National Advisory Committee. We should not fail to improve and augment existing facilities and personnel to enable that efficient organization more effectively to meet the rapidly increasing needs of aeronautics.

[1] Where the term "coordinate" or "coordination" is used in this report, it is employed in the sense only, viz: to bring into a common action, movement, or condition; to regulate and combine in harmonious action; to adjust or harmonize—as to coordinate muscular movement. The committee does not intend that in performing coordinating work any of the actual elements coordinated shall be performed by the coordinator. In coordinating, however, the coordinator should catalog and assume the responsibility of seeing that all interested parties benefit by such cataloging and coordination.

We recommend that the sum of $631,000 be allotted forthwith to the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics for fundamental research. The record of this committee would cause us to endorse any recommendation on this expenditure which the chairman of that organization would care to make. To us it would seem that $131,000 of this might well be used for the employment of engineers, scientists, and technicians of the highest caliber attainable in the world, and the balance of $500,000, we believe, could be spent well on a program recently agreed upon by engineers representing several private aeronautical concerns and approved by the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

Both for land planes and for seaplanes, research facilities are needed. They must be had to make investigations with larger scale models operated at higher speeds. Fundamental data should be available for the design and construction of better and larger aircraft. The results of such research will provide a more accurate basis for the expenditure of millions of dollars in the construction of new aircraft. The truth of these statements must be self-evident.

AIRCRAFT ENGINES

Almost every commission or congressional body that has investigated aeronautics during the past generation, and investigations by governmental bodies have averaged at least one a year since 1916, has found that American aeronautics needs for safety and for other reasons, more powerful aircraft engines. Most of the investigating bodies have recommended that the Government take constructive action on this subject. This sound advice has fallen upon deaf ears. In the eyes of those officials chosen to administer them, Federal aeronautical appropriations have not been great. Apparently the Army, Navy, and governmental bodies handling commercial aeronautics fear to take from their annual appropriations a sum large enough really to place America first in aircraft engines. To avoid this obstacle it would appear to be wise to appropriate a fund for the engineering development of powerful aircraft engines, the appropriation not to be charged to the annual appropriation of a Government department. Larger power plants than are now available in this country would contribute to safety on our air lines. Types other than the conventional ottocycle engine might make for greater security in the varying conditions of flight. Military demands dominate and have brought into existence larger engines abroad than here. To provide the incentive for the development of engines that might well be of inestimable value in military aviation in the event of emergency, we make a definite recommendation for the appropriation of $1,500,000 to bring into being in American shops, proven higher powered American motors. This should promote the early advent of larger power output in units and keep us abreast of foreign power plants. Not only will this benefit safety in commercial work but it will insure larger engines with higher performance for military aircraft in the Army and the Navy.

In 1934, instigated by the wisdom of the House Committee on Military Affairs, the Congress took such action as we are now recommending. Unfortunately, the language of the appropriation was not sufficiently specific. A small portion of the appropriated money was alloted by the President for a different purpose. The rest reverted to the Treasury. America needs more powerful aircraft engines and needs them as quickly as they can be developed.

Europe now designs more powerful and better performing large aircraft than does the United States. Whatever Europe has in the way of supremacy is by virtue of having available more horsepower in its aeronautical engines. Without more powerful engines our commercial and military aerial supremacy is threatened. As it is now, should we start today on this program, we shall still require years to accomplish it. Aeronautical engines are costly to develop, as well as to purchase. In no country does private capital find it possible to develop them. Every country that might threaten our national supremacy in the air has been and is now appropriating money for a solemn purpose which in America we are neglecting. Our possible enemies, in the only war that might defeat the United States, are engaged in such a development. Powerful aircraft engines, at least equal to those that are being used by our military and commercial aerial rivals, are an economical form of insurance against the mad dogs of war. It is the recommendation of your committee that the present Congress make an appropriation for this purpose, the money to become immediately available and to remain available until expended. It should be earmarked for the specific purpose of designing and developing high-powered aircraft engines. Your committee visualizes engines of between perhaps 3,000 and 4,000 horsepower as being desirable and necessary.

STRUCTURAL FAILURES

One witness testified that there has been a tendency of air lines to lighten ships in order to increase their pay load. Your committee has very carefully investigated this point and finds it to be without foundation. As a matter of fact, there have been no major structural failures in the air in scheduled air-line operations for some considerable time.

FURTHER POSSIBILITIES IN SAFETY INVENTIONS

A survey of the air-line accidents occurring in this country since the advent of the plane which can fly on one of two power plants, points the way to one clearly defined field of opportunity for inventors working toward safety in scheduled flying.

While the plane is en route, high up between stations, flying would actually seem to be safer than any other medium of transportation. We find no evidence of accidents resulting from failure during this period of flight which, after all, consumes most of the time on any one trip. It is on the take-off and on the approach for landing in bad weather that the accidents have occurred.

The "take-off" accident, due in part to "thick" weather, can be included for purpose of this analysis in the zone of flying wherein the pilot is coming down through the fog, mist, rain, or other atmospheric condition which renders the ground invisible or uncertain to the crew. In this maneuver, often performed with hills, ground obstacles, or high buildings nearby, the pilot must of necessity be positive of his position every instant. His general location does not suffice; he must have his "pin-point", the course he is "tracking", and his diminishing altitude, precise to a matter of feet, every moment of his approach. It is not on a two-dimensional area like a vessel at sea, but in the three dimensions of space, that his exact whereabouts to a matter of feet must be known to the pilot as he comes in on his glide at the high speed of a let-down. Aircraft drift so quickly, so unnoticably in high changing wind currents, that the utmost caution is necessary in the use of instruments for this purpose. The greatest technical contribution to be made to safe flying is the positive reliable solution of the problem.

Having landing fields or terminals away from buildings, preferably away from deceptive water areas, on the highest land in the neighborhood, is the first essential, for it has been proven that with existing equipment the problem is practically solved if the terrain and environs at the terminal are good. But when the destination is surrounded with mountains or high buildings, better and more auxiliary equipment for checking and verifying must be provided to counteract the possibility of a drift sidewise or of an unexpected rise or drop in altitude.

Radio is the one promise on the horizon at the present time for the solution of this problem. Radio in itself is a new science that is extremely complicated. Along with aeronautics, it is comparatively young, and there are not available many flying radio experts to whom the task can be presented. Moreover, some of our best radio experts are not familiar with the peculiar problems of actual flight.

We have mentioned one of the obvious solutions, the desirability of terminal airports with good approaches, free from obstacles. A second proven ground aid would obviously be the installation of many more radio marker beacons in the environs of airports. While the present proven radio marker beacon suitable for this purpose costs about $2,000, there is every hope that simple devices can be developed so that large numbers can be set up for use in bad weather, in series, multiples, or in any arbitrary layout. Each, with its distinctive recognition tone or code, will enable the pilot to establish what he calls a definite "fix." Given the reassurance that would then come as he passed over each, the chances of accidents which have occurred since modern and up-to-date flying methods have come into being would be minimized very materially.

However, technical improvements such as these are more within the field of the administrative agency of the Government than in the legislative scope of your committee. For this reason, in this report, and in legislation which we shall recommend, we aim to be sure that within the Government such organization shall prevail that there can be no room for confusion, no chance of unnecessary delays in making decisions. There must be an alert attitude to insure progress of the science of air navigation, and particularly in this problem of instrument flying on coming in for landing.

GOVERNMENTAL ADMINISTRATION

Reciting that the needs of aeronautics are so numerous and so pressing that there should be one official to give full and undivided attention to aeronautical matters, the Morrow Board, among its far-seeing recommendations, insisted that the Department requires an Assistant Secretary of Commerce. This is a position already legally provided for by act of Congress.

Your committee is of the opinion that a sound solution of our aeronautical difficulties lies first in a revival of the office of Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Air, and to assign to that official no extraneous duties. Not only is aeronautics a fast-moving industry, but it is highly technical. Speed in making decisions of great importance is frequently required. It would take a novice in this position a long time to acquire the necessary knowledge to be highly efficient. In charge of aeronautics should be a man who has ample time to devote to the job, experience enough to administer it, and force of character to control the position.

It is believed that the primary reason for many complaints and rumblings against the administration of civil aeronautics by the Department of Commerce is because no one of sufficient rank and practical experience devotes all his time to the problem. Aeronautics within the Department of Commerce as it is organized today is a stepchild. There can be no intelligent planning and forethought continuously devoted to the present or future needs of civil aeronautics unless the existing administration be improved.

We have no reason to doubt our long-held conviction that there should be an Assistant Secretary for Air in the Department of Commerce. The aeronautical industry in the United States has been rapidly assuming proportions of great importance. It will grow by leaps and bounds. It is of vital necessity to the future development and prosperity of the Nation that the aeronautical industry should be encouraged to develop to the utmost possible extent. In its scientific development it should not only be kept abreast, but, if possible, should be put ahead of other countries. These potentialities are in themselves ample enough to justify the restoration of an office of the rank of Assistant Secretary.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY FOR AERONAUTICS

In our proposed set-up the Assistant Secretary of Commerce (or, if this position be not restored, the Director of Aeronautics), with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, is given the duties enumerated in section 172 of the Air Commerce Act of 1926, as amended. Briefly stated, these are as follows:

(a) To encourage the establishment or airport facilities and other air-navigation facilities.

(b) To make recommendations as to the necessary meteorological service.

(c) To study the possibilities for development of air commerce and of the aeronautical industry and trade, and to collect and disseminate information relative thereto.

(d) To advise with the Bureau of Standards, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and other agencies in and out of the executive branch of the Government, in carrying forward research, development, and improved air-navigation facilities, with a view to greater safety.

(e) To investigate accidents in civil air navigation in the United States, including the attending facts, conditions, and circumstances. He is given the authority to hold hearings, examine witnesses, etc., reporting to the Secretary of Commerce all the facts discovered.

(f) To keep himself informed through existing Government channels regarding progress of aviation in other countries.

(g) To decide on the selection of new airways and sites on airways.

It is the thought of the committee that these responsibilities of the Secretary of Commerce fall into three categories: First, the promotion of aeronautics for the public good, together with the promotion of safety therein; second, the provision of approved aids and the control of all ground air-navigation facilities, both private and public; and third, the control of all flight activities.

(1) We feel that the Director of Aeronautics, whether he be an Assistant Secretary of Commerce, or whatever title he be given, should be the one person in the Department of Commerce directly responsible, under the Secretary, for general supervision of all the functions established by law to promote aeronautics and safety in the air.

(2) Reporting to him directly and to him only, should be an assistant responsible for the conduct and administration of a Division of Ground Facilities.

(3) Likewise, reporting directly and exclusively to him should be another assistant in charge of administration in the Division of Flight Activities.

DIVISION OF GROUND FACILITIES

On page 11 we discuss a proposed Bureau of Federal Airways. In the event that an Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Air is appointed, and we believe he should be, this activity of the Department of Commerce would be known as the "Bureau of Federal Airways." That is intended to do for aeronautics what the Bureau of Public Roads has done for highways, and the Bureau of Lighthouses in that field. We urge again that generous treatment of this problem is important to the perpetuity and sensible growth of air traffic.

In the event the Office of Assistant Secretary for Aeronautics be not restored and the work be supervised by a Director of Aeronautics, the two subdivisions above outlined (Ground Facilities and Flight Activities) must be maintained. For administrative reasons these must be segregated and delegated to assistants, as before indicated.

Likewise, the head of the Division of Ground Facilities should divide his responsibility into (a) construction and (b) maintenance.

(a) Construction of airways: This includes airports, emergency fields, and all ground facilities.

(b) Maintenance of ground facilities: These two divisions must be kept apart. A sharp line of demarcation must be drawn between construction and maintenance. We should be quite unwilling to have an organization set up, proposing to place construction and maintenance in the hands of one man, or of the same field group.

We are content to have the man in charge of the Branch of Construction and the man in charge of the Branch of Maintenance immediately responsible to the Chief of the Division of Ground Facilities. In view of the fact, however, that it might be the duty of the supervisor of maintenance sometimes to criticize the construction of the various facilities installed by the supervisor of construction, it would be fatal to air safety and the welfare of the public to have these two branches so intimately related that there should be embarrassment on the part of either supervisor to criticize the work of the other. We hope this recommendation in our report may not be overlooked in the mass of material which we are presenting.

We are assuming that there will be a spirit of cooperation, and that the supervisor of maintenance, having charge of ground facilities, shall be in constant contact with the corresponding supervisor in the department of regulation, which we will later describe.

The supervisor of maintenance shall be directly responsible to the chief of ground facilities, who in turn will report to the Director of Aeronautics. It should be the duty of the Maintenance Branch to see that all the ground facilities which have to do with safe airline transportation and private flying may be in first-class operating condition at all times.

BUREAU OF FEDERAL AIRWAYS

In order to secure a well-conceived system of connecting airways and continuity of purpose and planning in the construction of such airways, your committee feels that there should be created within the Department of Commerce a division, a Bureau of Federal Airways, (a) just as there is now within that Department a Bureau of Lighthouses and (b) just as there now exists within the Department of Agriculture a Bureau of Public Roads. The situation as pertains to our Federal airways reminds your committee very much of the situation which existed years ago in the Bureau of Agriculture as regards our surface highways. Two generations ago the Department of Agriculture was receiving so many requests and inquiries from farmers concerning the building of farm roads that the Secretary of Agriculture then designated two men to conduct an office within the Department of Agriculture, known as the Bureau of Road Inquiry. This bureau or office was created in 1892, not by legislative act but by the Secretary of Agriculture. At a later date this Bureau grew to such an extent that it finally became the Bureau of Public Roads.

The results from this worth-while activity are well known; America has created perhaps the finest system of surface highways existing in any nation of the world. Only by similar action may this country hope that such Federal airways as are planned for will be constructed in accordance with a well-conceived plan of action of a continuous and continuing nature, one that permits each airway to bear its proper relationship to each other.

In order to build a large aeronautical industry, manufacturing and encouraging the use of small private airplanes, your committee believes that the problem is very much the old story of which came first, the chicken or the egg. If there shall not be a large number of private airplanes, many of the proposed Federal airways may not be needed. Without the airways, the planes cannot be operated. It is the policy of all major nations to encourage private flying for what it is worth to national defense in the event of an emergency. With our wide expanse of territory, private flying is developing spontaneously and rapidly. It should be encouraged as a matter of national importance, as in other countries. Your committee foresees a sensible, simultaneous growth in the construction and use of private planes, and the development of Federal airways, just as happened in the matter of private motor vehicles and surface roadways. As roads grew better the public purchased more motor vehicles. As more motor vehicles were purchased, more public roads were not only desirable, but also essential and were constructed. Road building and manufacturing progressed hand in hand. Our national problem of building an aeronautical industry will, in your committee's opinion, be solved by applying this same general method. As we continue to build the airways more persons can operate and so will purchase more private planes. As we continue to purchase private planes, more need will exist for building Federal airways. Progress in each field goes hand in hand with the other.

Industry, not Government, will solve the problem of the low-priced private airplanes. In the meantime the Government might well cease spending money in designing such aircraft for private use and use the money so saved for more intelligent and timely expenditures toward the problem of immediate safety in the air. The best, quickest, and cheapest way to build a strong aircraft industry is to have the Government launch a sensible, continuous program, providing for the annual construction and maintenance of new and additional Federal aids to air navigation. This is exactly the same program as that used by our Government in constructing and maintaining coastwise and inland waterways.

The analogy of the waterways is more accurate than the analogy of public roads, because the air may truthfully be compared to the ocean or to inland waterways. As we have already noted, speaking from a broad viewpoint, the air is the only ocean exclusively navigable to all points of the earth's surface at all times. This ocean, which we call air, is navigated close to the earth—the coast line. Navigation along a specific airway may be compared to navigation along an inland waterway. For example, just as our Nation builds and marks its inland waterways along the Mississippi River, so also must this country build and mark its airway which parallels the Mississippi River.

We feel that generous treatment of this problem is important to the continuance and sensible growth of air traffic. Its handling warrants the creation of a bureau of Federal airways within the Department of Commerce, just as that Department now has its Bureau of Lighthouses.

DIVISION OF FLIGHT ACTIVITIES

Just as the chief of ground facilities has charge of all the ground equipment and ground personnel, the chief of flight activities will have charge of all air equipment and air personnel.

It shall be his duty to apply the regulatory powers recited in section 173 of the Air Commerce Act of 1926, as amended. These are as follows:

(a) Registration of aircraft.

(b) Rating of aircraft as to air-worthiness.

(c) Examination and rating of airmen.

(d) Examination and rating of privately owned air navigation facilities.

(e) Air traffic rules.

(f) Issuance, suspension, and revocation of certificates of all sorts, insofar as they apply to aeronautics.

(g) Supervision of schools and the instruction given to pilots and flight mechanics.

We do not undertake to go into details regarding this scheme of organization. We believe the thoughts we have in mind are self-evident. We are convinced, however, that if an organization is provided and its functioning is closely supervised by the Assistant Secretary for Aeronautics or the Director for Aeronautics, safety in the air will be promoted a thousandfold.

INSPECTION FORCE

The Department of Commerce has not stood alone in its testimony as to its need for an increase in its inspection force. The testimony of the air lines has likewise stressed the importance of the Government "tightening up" on its inspection of both the air lines and the private flyers. A fatal accident to a private flyer hurts all flying, because it instills fear into the public mind. It is fear, not fare, that keeps the seats of scheduled airplanes from being filled. If unjustified fear be eliminated, every seat in every existing air line would very likely be filled on every trip. The air lines would then be in need of additional equipment. The outgo and income of the post office for air mail would not only be balanced, but probably the cost of carrying the air mail could be reduced. If we remove this symptom of unwarranted fear, we shall have solved the problem of "subsidizing" the air lines.

The air lines request, and your committee feels these requests are justified, that (a) the Government should have a maintenance inspector of one man at each complete air terminal; (b) two Government inspectors should be placed on each major air line; (c) one should be provided for each small air line, to inspect the enforcement of safety rules; (d) Government inspectors should be thoroughly qualified in the details of their business; (e) they should be appointed because of their experience and knowledge; (f) that the "merit system", as distinguished from the political system, should prevail; and (g) Government inspectors, who are maintenance men, should visit the factories where airplanes are built during a sufficient period of time while new planes are under construction to make sure they shall be familiar with the planes when ready for use in the air.

The science of aeronautics changes so rapidly that one cannot keep up with it unless given every chance to familiarize himself with that which he is going to inspect. When air lines are contracting for new equipment running into great sums of money, be that equipment of an experimental or of a production nature, a Government inspector should be stationed at the factory while construction is proceeding. Thus criticisms by the Government of the airplane can be handled during the construction period rather than at a later time when public safety might be involved, and when changes would involve a needless waste to the air lines, perhaps of millions of dollars.

Not only are the inspectors along the air lines insufficient in number but particularly is the Department of Commerce inspection system woefully undermanned as regards private flying. The Department has about 60 inspectors to examine, inspect, and pass upon 14,000 licensed flyers, 24,000 student and other pilots, 8,000 airplanes, and 2,500 mechanics and other miscellaneous personnel. It will be noted that the 60 air-line inspectors are annually required to examine over 48,500 persons and machines. In other words, each inspector has to inspect per year over 800 human beings and airplanes scattered from one end of the country to the other. This is more than any man can do properly. No wonder the Assistant Director of the Bureau of Air Commerce testified that lack of inspection was responsible for some of the deaths in private flying aircraft accidents.

Formerly, the Department of Commerce inspected private aircraft semiannually. Lack of personnel has reduced this operation so greatly that such inspections are made but once a year. Annual inspections of aircraft are felt by your committee to be insufficient for safety in private flying. An airplane is so complicated and so subject to need of attention that it is unsafe for it to be permitted to operate with annual inspections only. Surely, the need (a) for eliminating politics from the air-lines inspection service, (b) for the substitution of the merit system in place of patronage, and (c) for drastic increase in the number of Government inspectors is beyond debate.

INSPECTION OF RADIO TRANSMITTERS AND INSTALLATIONS ABOARD AIRCRAFT

While your committee has not been able to find record of many failures in radio transmitters or receivers aboard airplanes, it is not entirely satisfied with the present system prevailing to regulate, inspect, and check this apparatus and the manner in which radio is handled in daily use.

It is a fact that in several of the recent crashes the pilot, while not exactly lost, thought, as he approached his destination, that he was at a point some distance from where he actually was.

A pilot on arriving at his objective over, or actually in clouds and out of sight of the ground, invariably has moments of suspense as he lowers slowly, waiting for the "break through" or the time when he can see everything below. Wind shifts can carry a plane off quickly to one side or another, sometimes without the knowledge of the crew. Navigation at high speed of flight demands the use of radio tied-in accurately with ground "fixes" during this maneuver. Normally all this is quite a simple task, but if the radio fails, it is dangerous, especially if there are high hills nearby. This problem was one of the last obstacles to be surmounted in making bad-weather flying safe. However, to insure that it shall always be properly taken care of, your committee intends later to recommend that certain obligations in safe operation be placed with the Federal Communications Commission. Licensing, approval of equipment, methods of installation and operation thereof, together with any standards, should be set up and flexibly administered by the Department of Commerce as at present. However, a Bureau of Aircraft Radio within the Federal Communications Commission will be responsible for the occasional inspection, checks, warnings, and enforcement on the normal operation of aircraft so far as radio is concerned.

CONSTRUCTION AND CONTROL AT AIR TERMINALS

The equipment and maintenance of certain selected landing areas should become a Federal or State, or possibly a joint, responsibility. A few municipalities maintain airports for traffic, the chief beneficiaries of which are municipalities outside the respective States. Newark is a good example of a city in another State assuming almost the entire burden of air transport landing facilities for the entire New York metropolitan area.

City pride results frequently in a municipality assuming an unjustified obligation to provide facilities which keep its terminal in satisfactory condition for interstate air commerce. The ownership, operation, and maintenance of an airport used in interstate commerce should be assumed by the largest possible political division enjoying the benefits from the facility, just as is the case now with our inland waterways. The present and future construction and maintenance of the inland waterways and the facilities for coastwise shipping is assumed by the public at large. A similar arrangement should exist for air navigation facilities used in interstate air commerce. A further and supporting reason for suggesting Federal control and support of such landing areas along Federal airways is the growing use of municipal air terminals by military aircraft. The necessity for centralized control of every part of our Federal airways system, including air terminals, is indicated by the rapid development of radio control over all airplane movements on our Federal airways.

The present system of airway traffic control has in it a missing link, caused by the fact that the control of the Federal Government does not reach within the boundaries of the air terminals. The complete control of the Federal Government along the Federal airways should not be jeopardized by breaks in the system. The navigation of the airplane should be controlled, not only while the airplane is in the air along the airways, but also during its maneuvering on or about air terminals. There is every evidence that such a development is mandatory and should not be delayed.

SPEEDY ACTION NEEDED

Your committee finds that the death of our colleague, Senator Cutting, was caused by failure of the Government's ground organization to function properly, and by inadequate and deficient airway aids. In view of this we should endeavor to have our country organize all Federal airways so that this distressing accident may in some manner eventuate in the saving of the lives of other persons.

Thiers asserted that "the first business of a government is to govern"; surely, the second business of a Government is to protect the lives of its people, whether at home or abroad, and whether on land, on water, or in the air. No Government could be respected that permitted the continuance of conditions in relation to its highways, waterways, or airways, that might result in unnecessary destruction of lives.

Aids to air navigation present a problem for which there can be but one solution. There must be no delay in doing all we can to make flying safe. Immediate approval of a program of safety will bring a sense of security that is not now felt by our citizens. There is sure to be praise for our efforts to get immediate and definite action in this direction. There will be bitter criticism if we fail.

Federal airway traffic control was instituted in 1936, but as we have indicated, expansion of the system at various congested air terminals is already becoming essential. As time goes on, the congestion will increase along all the airways and particularly at an increasing number of air terminals.

The Seventy-fourth Congress appropriated funds for airway traffic control at eight congested air terminals. It is discouraging that but five of these have as yet been installed. The main need at present is (a) to continue the system already started, and (b) to expand the number of cities served as air traffic gives evidence of becoming congested. We anticipate that during the coming few years a few additional cities may need to be added annually to those for which appropriations are made to control the traffic.

It was evident in March of 1936 that Congress would appropriate funds for airway traffic control so as to remove this outstanding hazard to safety in flight. The appropriation for this purpose was approved by the President on May 15, 1936. But the Bureau of Air Commerce did not move until July 7. Even then it added little to what the scheduled air lines had already provided. Months have elapsed and all this time human lives have been unnecessarily jeopardized. While the Bureau has debated, the desire and decision of Congress have remained in suspense. The launching of airway traffic control, contemplated by congressional action, has been unduly delayed.

FLYING HOURS

The Secretary of Commerce is not only authorized, but he is actually directed, by section 12 of the Air Mail Act, to fix maximum flying hours. Not only is the Air Mail Act clear on this point, but the legislative history of the statute is explicit in this particular. Numerous rulings of the Supreme Court, even including those as recent as 1936, have held that, when there is in the same statute a particular enactment and also a general one, which in its most comprehensive sense would include what is embraced in the former, the particular enactment must be operative; the general enactment must be taken to affect only such cases within its general language as are not within the provisions of the particular enactment. Section 12 of the Air Mail Act, as amended, thus beyond question governs the question of maximum flying hours for pilots, while section 13 pertains only to their other working conditions. (See subject "Pilot Fatigue" below.) Therefore, the Department of Commerce is exonerated, in the opinion of your committee, from charges by witnesses to the effect that the Department had violated the law with respect to pilots' flying hours.

PILOT FATIGUE

For some years there has been more or less of a controversy over the maximum numbers of hours a pilot may fly without reaching that point of fatigue which endangers safety in the air. At the aero-medical meeting in Los Angeles last August, flight surgeons were practically unanimous in their opinion that it is not work but worry over affairs not related to piloting nor to aeronautics that causes the drain on a pilot's human faculties, creating a menace to safety. In view of the advance that has taken place in aeromedicine, the opinion of that competent medical body must be accepted, and now we may hope that the problem of pilot fatigue can be and should be settled scientifically. A committee of leading American physicians has been appointed to work out the details of a proposed scientific study of this question.

A great majority of the accidents now taking place in scheduled air transportation are being blamed on the human element, particularly on the pilot. The personnel of our private flyers are a splendid and really unusual lot of men. There may be exceptions, of course, but, in general, a comparison of our private flyers with the personnel in other fields of life shows that airmen are outstanding. This holds true with the men on the ground as well as the men in the air.

Your committee considers the matter of pilot fatigue so fundamental and so necessary of accurate scientific determination that we believe immediate action should be taken. To that end we recommend an appropriation at this session of Congress of $50,000, the money to become immediately available and to remain available until expended in the financing of a scientific study of, and the securing of a scientific answer to this question of pilot fatigue.

The Federal Coordinator of Transportation, in his publication dated March 1936, entitled "Hours, Wages, and Working Conditions in Scheduled Air Transportation", said the following on this particular subject:

"The former maximum and present limits of flight-hours per month for pilots and copilots were fixed empirically. The maximum of flight-hours per month recommended some years ago by the Aero-Medical Association also lacked a carefully developed scientific basis. So important a limitation should have a more substantial basis. Scientific determination of critical points in fatigue is now possible by the use of methods and apparatus developed in recent years. Such an investigation should be instituted along lines broad enough to embrace consideration of the effects not only of different flight periods but also differences in type and equipment of planes, in noise and vibration, in visibility, in extent and character of navigational aids and landing conditions, in terrain, altitude, and temperature, and in the latter connection, the effects in particular of frequent or marked changes of altitude and temperature on the human system. The effects of different operating schedules, especially those requiring long layovers and different durations, also require consideration. Records of accidents should be studied to obtain such light as they may afford on the influence of different flight conditions. In the last 2 or 3 years some of the factors entering into the fatigue questions have undergone important change, such as the number of hours involved in flight, and also the lengthening of duration of straightway flights. The fatigue problem continues to be one of pressing importance and calls for immediate investigation. Experiments should be conducted under both laboratory and flight conditions. The results of the study should be translated by the agency responsible for the formulation of regulations controlling matters affecting safety. No attempt should be made to express such limits in statutes. The administrative agency should be left free to revise the standards to meet changing conditions."

MODERN FLYING

The Federal Government has contributed a good deal in the way of aids to air navigation, both for scheduled operators and for military and private fliers. But, unfortunately, it has not kept pace with the recent rapid strides in the art of flying. Until 3 years ago, before blind or instrument flying became an essential to positive schedules, pilots preferred to fly contact; that is, to "keep one eye on the ground" at all times, irrespective of weather. This meant that in storms, when ceilings were low and low scudding clouds reached down to the very ground, flying was dangerous. At that time advantage could not be taken of Government aids which beckon the fliers to higher levels where safety from obstacles, hills, and mountain peaks prevails. Federal aids were then actually ahead of their time.

Then there came improved air liners capable of flying with one engine completely out, fitted with gyroscopes to enable them to keep on an even keel in fog, and with radio instruments to tune in on Government beacons. Pilots were quick to climb high and get away from the hazards of ground obstacles.

Today there are 28,884 miles of United States Federal airways installed under authority of the Air Commerce Act of 1926. Aids to navigation exist on but 22,000 miles. The present airways are a splendid monument to the foresight of their creators. But since they were installed the science of air navigation has progressed. Yet some of the present airway aids have become obsolescent, due to their being 5, 6, and even 8 years old. The science of air navigation has advanced beyond the aids provided on the ground. The existing aids need improvement, modernization, and additions.

In 1926 scheduled air lines flew 4,318,087 miles and carried only 5,782 passengers. In 1935 they flew 60,000,000 miles and carried 860,000 passengers; in 1936 they flew 63,777,226 miles and carried 1,020,931 passengers. Where, in 1931 the passenger-miles flown per passenger-fatality were but 5,000,000, safety has increased so that in 1935 29,000,000 miles were flown per passenger-fatality. Only 15 passengers were killed during 1935. However, in 1936, when 46 passengers were killed as compared to only 15 in 1935, 9,534,390 passenger-miles were flown per passenger fatality. While in 1928 the fatal accident occurred for each 890,000 of scheduled airplane flying, by 1935 safety had increased to such an extent that a fatality occurred only after an average of 8,700,000 miles, and in 1936, despite the discouraging year, a fatality occurred only after an average of 1,386,460 miles.

The aids we recommend will still further increase safety, as well as regularity, reliability, and dependability of service. An increase in those safety factors will lessen the fear of air travel. A decrease in fear will surely increase passenger business, thus permitting the air lines which are now annually running millions of dollars "in the red" to approach or attain operation "in black ink."

Airway aids are provided not alone for scheduled air transports, but likewise are of equal value to the private flyer and for the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard. They are a factor of tremendous importance in our scheme of national defense.

Air traffic has increased so greatly within recent years that our airways are now badly congested around certain major air terminals. Aids for air-traffic control are just as necessary at this ever-increasing number of congested terminals as are traffic-control lights essential to highway traffic in and around congested areas.

The air is like an ocean, the only ocean navigable to all points of the earth's surface. Just as the Government follows its traditional policy and, out of the Treasury, provides aids for navigation on the seas and inland waterways, marking the dangerous rocks and reefs, so likewise it is the duty of government to provide similar markings for the navigation of that greatest of seas, the air. Under adverse weather conditions, airway aids are indispensible.

The necessary airway aids, subject perhaps to modernization and improvement as time passes, will last the Government a number of years. Nothing in the necessary airway aids is experimental. All types of installations have already been tested and proven.

The air lines are now spending $11,000,000 and planning on spending yet an additional $15,000,000 on new, more modern, and safer equipment for use above the ground to obtain safety in the air. It is believed that the Government can and should insure air travelers that degree of safety, regularity, and reliability which they have a right to expect when they purchase transportation or proceed by private plane over the authorized Federal aerial highways.

Aids to navigation are required for installation in 43 States, plus Alaska, where 29 air companies operate, and in the Caribbean. They will affect the safety of travel in all 48 States, plus air travel throughout our far-flung Territories.

Based on Department of Commerce cost figures, the estimated expense of the necessary navigational aids along those airways over which United States mail is flown, is as follows:

Domestic	$14,000,000
Alaska (report of Gov. John W. Troy, Nov. 22, 1935)	2,900,000
Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands	30,000
Estimated total	16,930,000

The break-down of these figures are found in the hearings of the committee on February 16, 1937.

AMOUNT OF $12,414,000 FOR PROVEN AIDS NEEDED NOW

As the domestic situation is so pressing and as a large program clearly defined should effect savings through quantity purchasing we recommend the immediate appropriation of $10,000,000 so that construction of these aids and their early operation will not be retarded 1 day more than necessary.

We note particularly the striking need for radio marker beacons of high frequency to mark zones of silence over airports, to mark mountain peaks or ridges in the proximity of terminals, and for traffic control.

The need of $2,364,000 annual additional appropriation for the Weather Bureau is urgent and can be placed in the same category.

Fifty thousand dollars should be made available at once for a study of pilot fatigue, making a total of $12,414,000, which should be appropriated from the Treasury forthwith and spent as quickly as is practicable.

We are recommending elsewhere additional expenditures in long-term spending for respectively, research, development, experimentation, and additional administrative expenses in different agencies of the Government, but these cannot be classed as "emergency", "pressing", or "imperative" as can the above.

Provision should be made, too, for whatever assistance in air navigation facilities that may be needed to make safe and efficient those American aircraft which are in competition with foreign subsidized ships en route to, or in countries under, foreign flags.

Although the total of the appropriation now necessary may appear to be large, it should be noted that but little was spent during the past 5 years on the construction of additional aids to air navigation. The language of the regular annual appropriation acts was so broad that the Bureau of Air Commerce was enabled to spend, and apparently did spend, a very large portion of its appropriation in a manner that contributed neither to the construction of aids to air navigation nor to safety in the air. The following tabulations compiled by the Department of Commerce show the sums actually expended on the construction of new and additional aids to air navigation:

Expenditures for construction of new and additional aids to air navigation during the years prior to the time when instrument flying became possible

Fiscal year:	Out of regular appropriations
1928	$1,481,610
1929	1,740,000
1930	1,521,000
1932	1,471,500

It will be noted that for the 5 years 1928 to 1932, both inclusive, years in which the amount of night flying was relatively small and instrument flying almost nonexistant, an average sum of approximately 1⅔ million dollars was spent annually from regular appropriations for the construction of new and additional aids to air navigation. Beginning in 1933, a very serious and regrettable decline took place in such expenditures. As we understand the situation, based on a Department of Commerce exhibit, the following tabulation shows what has happened in the construction of aids to air navigation for the fiscal years 1933 to 1936, both inclusive, years in which instrument flying has become common.

Expenditure for construction of new and additional aids to air navigation since the date of the introduction of instrument flying, and during the years in which air navigational aids have become vitally important

Fiscal year	Out of regular appropriations	National Industrial Recovery allotments	Emergency relief construction
1933	0	0	$75,210
1934	0	[1] $2,064,525	0

[1] Expended over the 3-year period of 1934, 1935, and 1936.

It should be observed that the paucity of expenditures indict the Government for failure to provide adequately for air navigational facilities. However, the Congress may take some satisfaction in considering past appropriations, when it notes the fact that in the years of zero expenditures, Congress had appropriated larger sums than were utilized. The Department of Commerce turned back to the Treasury in 1933 the sum of $1,321,287.83 and in 1934 the sum of $2,289,442.58, which sums had been partly impounded and partly unexpended.

It will be noted that even if $5,000,000 be appropriated and made immediately available for use in the modernization of existing airways and in the construction of new and additional aids to air navigation within the continental limits of the United States, as indicated in our letter to the Department of Commerce, dated November 8, 1935,[2] Congress will do no more than make up for the deficiencies in aids that were created by the lack of expenditures during the fiscal years 1933 to 1936, both inclusive. During those years the miles of Federal airways were increased from 26,745 to 28,884. During the same period the total weight of mail dispatched increased more than 2,000,000 pounds per annum; express carried increased from a quarter of a million pounds to two and one-half million pounds per year; and scheduled passenger-miles actually flown increased from 90,567,313 to over 243,779,934 miles per year. It is obvious that the drastic Federal reduction in the construction of airways aids during the period of time when flying was so rapidly increasing has prevented the Government from doing its duty in keeping pace with industry and has jeopardized the safety of life and property of our citizens entrusted to transportation by air.

Even should the above-mentioned sum of $5,000,000 now be expended for the construction of new aids to air navigation, there will remain without aids more than 5,000 miles of Federal airways, installed under authority of the Air Commerce Act of 1926. Over these the United States mail and American citizens are daily flown without the benefit of such air navigational aids as are designed to save human life and cargo. It is obvious that the aforementioned $5,000,000 would complete only approximately one-third of the capital expenditure that is truly necessary at this very moment. We should appropriate not less than $10,000,000 this session.

Not alone is immediate action on this subject required for the private flyer and for commercial aeronautics, but the action we are recommending is the only one that can insure the quick mobilization of our military air force in time of war. Timely transfer of that fleet from one coast to another under wartime requirements, regardless of adverse atmospheric conditions, is impossible at present. We are now spending annually many millions of dollars on an Army Air Force that might be grounded in the wrong place if atmospheric conditions should prove adverse at a crucial moment. This is an unpardonable national oversight. Just as countries must build railroads and highways in time of peace for strategic use in the event of war, so must we now construct Federal airways that may be used in time of peace by our private citizens and our commerce, but which in time of war are essential to the concentration and timely use of our military air force. Without a proper system of airways, such as your committee is suggesting, it is possible that adverse atmospheric conditions might make our air force ineffective at a critical time in the defense of our country.

While on this subject, in addition to our domestic situation, attention is invited to the special problem in Alaska. (See p. 33.)

This committee has heard Department of Commerce testimony which was intended to convey the impression that the lack of airway radio aids was not a hazard to the Army flyers who were carrying the mail in 1934. Examination of the record shows that the files of the Baker Board are filled with testimony showing that the airway radios were defective or unreliable, or both, during the period the Army was entrusted with this undertaking. In investigating the recent accidents in interstate commerce, your committee cannot help a feeling of regret that the Bureau of Air Commerce did not profit by the evidence introduced before the Baker Board on this subject. The Director of the Bureau of Air Commerce, for some reason, neglected to testify before the Baker Board when the latter body would have welcomed the receipt of any possible enlightenment on this point. The Bureau of Air Commerce should have taken seriously the great amount of evidence presented to the Baker Board on the subject of defective and undesirable features in the radio aids along our airways. Had it done so, it is believed that scientific research might long ago have been instituted to correct and improve the technical situation. In that event, it is probable, lives might not have been lost in some of America's recent flying accidents.

The testimony of officials of the Bureau of Air Commerce was to the effect that European commercial air lines do not have the benefit of properly laid out airways. But it should be noted that there is no possible chance at present of building a lighted and completely equipped airway between the capitals and industrial centers of the Continent of Europe. In countries of such small dimensions as those of western Europe, a properly equipped airway might permit an enemy to attack with success. The United States can be thankful for the great oceans on either side of it, and for the friendly neighbors to the north and to the south. The Bureau of Air Commerce has lost sight of these fundamentals. It would be just as sensible to say that American citizens do not need their right arms because the people of some other land are able to get along with but one arm. Why handicap and endanger ourselves solely because the citizens of some other nation or nations are forced by circumstances to operate under such unenviable conditions?

The question of airway aids is no longer solely a question of performance of schedule; it is now a matter of life and death. Surely, human life is just as precious in one section of America as in another. Since it is practically impossible to predict where the next accident will occur it is therefore equally impossible to compile a master list showing thereon, in accurate order of importance, the aids now necessary to safe air navigation. It is urged and recommended that an appropriation be granted during this present Congress to cover in full the construction and maintenance of all the necessary aids to air navigation. While the sum may appear large, its size fades into insignificance when we realize that the grand total represents approximately but a week's expenditure of our Bureau of Public Roads for surface highways, for which this country appropriates approximately $400,000,000 annually.

Your committee agrees with the safety recommendations concerning regular appropriations as set forth by President Roosevelt's Accident Prevention Conference in a subcommittee meeting headed by the Honorable WILLIAM GIBBS MCADOO on December 18, 1935, which recommended as follows:

"1. That the President be requested to indicate to his budgeting and appropriating authorities his desire (a) that safety measures under the Bureau of Air Commerce deemed adequate by the Secretary of Commerce be authorized and provided for by regular appropriation; and (b) that the cumulative obsolescence and growing inadequacy of safety equipment under the Bureau of Air Commerce be immediately corrected by special appropriation or allotment of available emergency funds; and

"2. That the directors charged with the expenditure of relief funds waive such regulations as now stand in the way of their approving the requisitions made for providing these safety features in the installation of further aids to navigation on the airways and airports in the United States, and thus provide greater safety for the American traveling public.

These recommendations have been endorsed by the American Legion, the National Aeronautic Association, the National Association of State Aviation Officials, and the National Safety Council. The last-named organization set aside its policy of "no resolutions" to call to the country's attention the need for immediate action in this field.

The report of the Committee on Air Commerce and Planning of the Business Advisory Council, as approved by the Business Advisory Council on April 30, 1936, and letters from the chairman of your committee to the Director of the Budget, give reasons identical to some of those herein set forth as to why the construction of certain fundamental aids to air navigation should be undertaken at once. The soundness of these recommendations is beyond dispute. The Department of Commerce has testified before this committee to the effect that a large proportion of the ills complained of in air navigation are directly traceable to a lack of funds. It is unfortunate that the Bureau of Air Commerce did not, to your committee's knowledge, request the necessary appropriations some time ago. It was not until your committee, during its air studies, urged the Bureau, that any request was finally made.

Action on the appropriations which we have suggested in our analysis above, pages 11 and 13, should constitute one of the first acts of the present Congress.

WEATHER REPORTS AND SAFETY

Your committee has already indicated that up to and including the fiscal year 1932 the subject of airway aids was apparently being satisfactorily conducted by the Federal Government. Aerological appropriations suffered approximately a 40-percent reduction from 1932 during the years 1933, 1934, and 1935, even though in that period the amount of scheduled flying increased about threefold, night flying became common, and instrument flying, formerly nonexistent, became the normal performance.

In detail the following tabulation shows the reduction in Weather Bureau appropriations:

Weather Bureau appropriations

Fiscal year	Administration	General weather service and research	Horticultural	Aerological	Total
1926	$125,000	$2,255,944	$25,960	$107,100	$2,514,004
1927	125,000	2,315,430	27,500	176,150	2,644,080
1928	127,000	2,253,733	31,500	241,500	2,653,733
1929	127,000	2,298,000	31,500	315,000	2,771,500
1930	136,000	2,517,000	40,900	850,000	3,543,900
1931	137,680	2,535,200	50,400	1,400,000	4,123,280
1932	137,680	2,585,200	65,500	1,709,340	4,497,720
1933	136,180	2,503,218	59,700	1,465,440	4,164,038
1934	104,210	1,773,613	31,194	1,052,442	2,961,459
1935	118,793	1,883,260	33,159	1,128,647	3,163,859
1936	124,840	[1] 2,050,968	49,467	1,213,929	3,439,204

[1] $10,000 of this was for western Montana.

Generally speaking, and especially in view of the reduction during recent years of its appropriations for the meteorological services for aeronautics, the Weather Bureau has accomplished a noteworthy task with credit to its traditions. But your committee urges that the present Congress not only reinstate the cuts heretofore made in the appropriations for this Bureau, but also increase the amounts. Safety in the air depends to a great extent upon timely and accurate meteorological reports. Furthermore, information obtained by the Weather Bureau for aeronautics becomes of daily use in the lives of our citizens. The United States is falling behind in this most necessary service. For example, the United States of Soviet Russia spends for weather service approximately 27 times the annual expenditures of this country. Your committee foresees a need for increased appropriations for aerology which, within a few years, may involve appropriations for this service possibly three to five times their present size.

The development of weather service for flying activities in this country has been and is chiefly along two lines:

1. The organization of a comprehensive network of stations giving reports of sufficient frequency and accuracy to provide a complete picture of current conditions and their changes with time; and

2. The charting and analysis of all this material in accordance with the results of modern studies of the structure and behavior of the various conflicting air masses whose interactions produce our weather; this is done so that as accurate forecasts as possible may be made of future changes.

In carrying out the first objective, experience has shown that there is urgent need of a moderate extension of the present service, particularly along the following lines:

(a) Additional off-airway stations to provide reports which will show the approach of bad weather conditions toward the airways. Lack of such information has at times resulted in unfavorable weather arriving at the airways almost without warning.

(b) Additional observations from stations already established along some airways on which there is at present comparatively little flying. For such flying only one observation per flight is made. There should be another observation an hour or so earlier in order to establish what we may call the "trend" of the weather.

(c) Additional funds are needed to make possible more frequent inspections of the observing stations. This would correct a weakness to which attention has been called by some witnesses, namely, inaccurate or incomplete reports by observers at isolated stations where there is no opportunity for them to receive the necessary instructions.

(d) The extension of the teletype system of the Department of Commerce would very materially increase the efficiency of the weather service.

In connection with the second objective, namely, improvement of the forecasts, the following are the chief needs:

(a) A material increase in the number of upper-air observational stations. At the present time observations of wind aloft are made at about 72 points by means of pilot balloons. Observations of temperature and humidity are made by means of airplanes at only 12 points. There should be about 31 additional pilot-balloon stations and 15 additional airplane observation stations; but, more important, it should be possible to make four observations each day at all of these stations, instead of only two or three, as is the case at many of them at present. Much more detailed information than is at present available is required regarding conditions of temperature and humidity in the upper atmosphere. These are useful not only in providing data concerning current conditions but also, and more important, in giving the essential data for making possible a physical analysis of the structure of the air as a basis for forecasts of future weather development. At the present time such data are secured by means of airplanes. Within a relatively short time these will undoubtedly be displaced by another device, namely, the radiometeorograph, a development sponsored by the United States Weather Bureau.

This is a very interesting device which enables weather observers to obtain accurate information aloft and at different elevations, irrespective of visibility. Heretofore, airplanes have been sent up for this purpose, but this instrument, in reality a miniature inexpensive broadcasting radio station weighing about 2 pounds, is sent aloft attached to a small spherical balloon. It keeps transmitting continuously the changing weather data as it rises to great altitude, and the ultimate finder, for a small reward, returns it to the Government. American adaptations of this device are already in existence. One design has been in use in Soviet Russia for some time and has proven most helpful, especially in giving accurate data from various strata aloft.

Regardless of what apparatus is used, the essential thing is that the observations be more regular than at present, reach higher altitudes, and cover the country more completely.

(b) Although the systematic application of sound physical principles to the problems of forecasting has been practiced only about a year, very considerable improvement in forecasts has been experienced. The Weather Bureau is seriously handicapped, however, in having as yet only a very small number of employees fully trained in and conversant with the more modern technique in forecasting. Its force includes a large number with all the necessary basic training and education, but they need additional training along this specialized line. One of the greatest needs at the present time is authority to detail a limited number of men each year for the next few years to educational institutions that are equipped to give such training. Similar practice is already followed by the War and Navy Departments.

(c) For the most effective possible use of air-mass analysis as well as for providing current information of great value, not only to aeronautics but to many other activities, it is essential to have the number of daily weather maps increased from two to four each day. In order to do this properly, funds should also be provided for increasing from two to four the number of reports from ships at sea. This will be particularly important as transoceanic flying becomes established.

PERSONNEL IN SCHEDULED AIR-LINE INDUSTRY

To ask the general public to provide for capital for our air-transport companies and simultaneously to prohibit by law the procurement of the highest possible grade of efficient personnel must serve to handicap safety as well as progress in aeronautics. While there are excellent men in the air-line industry, the situation can and should be improved. Your committee, in agreement with the former Federal coordinator in his study of the situation, cannot agree with the theory of the present air-mail law which places rigid limitations upon stockholders, directors, officials, and employees of air-transport companies. Good men, the very best of American men, are needed as officials in all these companies. There are sharp competitive conditions which must be met if outstanding executives are to be obtained. The air lines in their daily battle for safety and efficiency are faced with the problem of commanding the services of high-grade men for official and technical positions. Those having the necessary qualifications are limited in number. Air-line corporations require men of great experience, technical knowledge, and a high degree of accuracy of judgment. Such men are not easy to find. They are comparatively rare, and their services are in great demand in several fields.

The strain on the head of the senior official of an air line is great. A competent president is on the job every minute. He is constantly faced with the necessity of making decisions that may involve life and death. He has not only the ordinary problems of a highly competitive business but also the stress occasioned by the eternal vigilance required for the protection of human life and property transported by air. Yet under the law an officer, director, or employee cannot accept more than the legally specified maximum of $17,500 a year from all sources combined, not alone from an air-mail carrier but from any other and totally distinct company, whatever be its nature or business. While good men may now be serving the air lines because of their love of aeronautics, or as a patriotic duty, we cannot depend upon charity for the successful and safe operation of air transportation. Ultimately, air-mail-carrier officers and employees will be either those who cannot obtain more profitable employment elsewhere, or those who are not worthy of better-paid positions. We cannot depend on such persons to upbuild our scheduled air-transport industry. Testimony before this committee indicates, we fear, that self-protection will cause the best men to leave this industry and escape the undesirable restrictions imposed by law.

In this connection, much was made by witnesses of what they consider to be unjust discrimination. They pointed to the Postmaster General's annual report, for the year 1935, which indicates a deficit of $86,609,069.40 for the carrying of second-class mail, which means really a subsidy to magazines and newspapers. Undoubtedly in the interest of free press and the education of the public there has been created a deficit of 29 times as much money as is the deficit alleged for carrying the air mail. Yet the publications thus subsidized are not restricted as to the officers, directors, and employees they may choose, nor are these officers, directors, and employees restricted by law in their right to accept adequate compensation. Even in small towns, where the stress and strain upon the individual publisher or editor does not in the least compare to that affecting the employee of an air-mail contractor, the journalist is permitted to receive compensation unlimited by law and far greater than the law permits the air-mail employee to accept. The law that penalizes the skill and limits the earning capacity of the air-line personnel is regarded by some of our witnesses as a discriminating law, the intent of which was punitive and was intended to reach men who are no longer connected with the industry. They beg that it may be repealed.

The Senate committee that investigated the accidents involving the Morro Castle and the Mohawk found that the responsibility for the accidents rested upon the human element. There is a parallel to accidents in the air and to accidents upon the sea. If accidents are to be prevented, either in aeronautics or upon the seas, there must be no restriction against employing the best available men. Surely we must not encourage legislation that prevents the air-transport lines from obtaining the best American brains, whenever needed and wherever found. Otherwise America cannot hope for the best in safety nor for the maximum in progress.

Obviously ample capital is required for the operation of any company, business, or industry. This is particularly true in an air-transport company in order that sufficient funds may be available for the operating personnel to accomplish those results which are universally considered as essential to safety.

The financial losses of the air lines, especially since early 1934, have been so heavy that practically all lines are in need of additional paid-in capital. Our witnesses urge that there should be no more legal restrictions upon the lines than upon the railroad and steamship companies.

PROFIT AND LOSS

It should be unnecessary to point out that a profitable operation is essential to safety. It is bad enough for ordinary corporations to be harassed by losses, but in the case of the air vehicle, when safety depends on expensive equipment, there must be ample funds or the ships must be grounded. There must be profits if adequate and timely improvements in personnel, planes, and equipment are to be provided. Because a few persons made abnormal profits from speculative activities should not obscure the obvious truth that safety and efficiency demand reasonable profit in operation.

Investigation made by, and the testimony presented to, this committee indicate that the losses of the air-mail carriers in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, were about $4,000,000. Even though the losses are now less, their financial situation continues to be precarious. This is serious when it relates to a business in which ample cash in the bank is necessary if all personnel and matériel safeguards are to be obtained and used in the interest of safety. Until the air-transport business can be placed upon a profitable basis the situation in this industry will remain unhealthy.

In this connection it should be noted that at least a part of the losses of the air-mail carriers can be traced to the Government, and that no suitable effort has been made to compensate the carriers. After the air-mail contracts were made, many changes, advancements, and improvements in safety, performance, equipment, stops, etc., have been arbitrarily ordered by the Government. This has been done without compensating the mail contractors for radical changes in their contractual relations. Such changes have required annual expenditures on the part of the air lines, running from fifty to sixty thousand dollars in the case of some lines to seven figures in the case of others. When a contract is changed, it is the recognized rule, of course, that the person affected thereby is correspondingly compensated. But not so here, our witnesses say.

The Bureau of Air Commerce has required the operators to provide a number of additional safety devices and to finance new equipment more expensive in first cost and more expensive to operate. The law and the Bureau also added to operating costs by law and regulations, such as those fixing the maximum flying hours of pilots and specifying safety standards affected by equipment. Under the regulations of the Post Office Department, new and better equipment, additional stops, additional ground crews, and other factors, have been required of the air lines, because the Post Office considers such changes improve the service rendered to the public. The Labor Board greatly increased the pay of pilots, and the law also contemplates the addition of higher compensation and improved working conditions for certain employees. These and other changes have been made by law, or by Government departments at the expense of the air lines; the air lines have been granted no commensurate compensation to enable them to carry out their contractual duties.

Since these charges are true, it is only just to recommend that legislation be provided granting a remedy to the air-mail carriers. Such relief was granted by section 301 (a), title III, Public, No. 835 of the Seventy-fourth Congress (1936 Maritime Act); the Congress provided that any increase in operating expenses occasioned by the Government would justly and fairly provide a reason for an increased compensation to the carrier of mail by ships.

REFINANCING NEEDS

The losses suffered by each and every air carrier operating under contract with the Post Office Department to carry the domestic mail have been heavy since early 1934. In consequence, all or nearly all of our air-mail carriers will need to go to the public for refinancing now, or in the very near future. This action is made more certain by the need of air-line operators to purchase new and more modern equipment and safety devices. In some cases the air lines must obtain this equipment by borrowing.

The scheduled air-transport industry is a legitimate business and has the inherent right to request the support of the investing public. It should be no more hampered in raising its legitimate capital than is any other common carrier serving the necessity and convenience of the public.

OTHER ESSENTIALS—POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT TYPES OF AIR MAIL

The United States Post Office from the earliest days of our Republic has been a persistent pioneer in the encouragement of transport. Contracts for the transportation of mail by stagecoach, canal boat, pony express, railroads, ocean steamships, and, finally, airplanes were designed, not merely to pay the cost of transporting the mail but to share the cost of the construction and to encourage the operation of better vehicles to give faster service for the convenience of travelers and trade. This policy has been well sustained by successive Congresses for 80 years and should be continued. It imposes no great burden, because the revenue derived by the Government returns a substantial part of the cost.

The Post Office Department was selected as the chosen instrument of our Government and charged with the task of developing air transport on a commercial basis. In this connection the committee has studied the hearings before various Government agencies and boards, including the evidence and opinions furnished by competent experts and businessmen before the Federal Aviation Commission, of which the late Honorable Clark Howell was chairman.

Of course, it has always been the hope that every system of transporting the mail should strive to make itself economically self-sufficient. In the matter of air-mail transportation, our Government has three options:

1. It could allow civilian aviation to fend for itself;

2. It could instruct the Post Office to continue its interest in civil aviation, making necessary modification of existing practices to suit changing conditions of the time, but having as its basic policy the continuance of the arrangement whereby the airplane would be used for the transportation of mail, provided the sender wished to pay the additional charge for the stamps; or

3. The Government could decree that every community should be given the advantage of high-speed air transport for the transportation of all of its first-class letter mail and without extra charge for the postage, a policy accepted as an axiom prior to the birth of air transportation.

Originally, and undoubtedly wisely, the second option was adopted. But it is the feeling of many that the United States will, before long, be forced by public opinion to change to the third method. It is the guiding principle behind all the operations of our post-office system that every community is entitled to the fastest available means for the transportation of first-class letter mail. To give frequent, punctual, and quick communication and transportation of first-class letter mail, without the imposition of a surcharge, is regarded as one of the essential means Government has at its disposal to promote the common welfare.

The transportation of first-class letter mail by air, whenever and wherever time can be saved, will confer great benefits on all classes of citizens. As a result of the greatly increased and assured volume of such mail with the consequent revenue, larger aircraft, giving increased comfort and convenience, can be provided. Likewise, faster and more frequent services can be provided.

The world today can scarcely appreciate the numerous benefits which have resulted from the introductions by our Government years ago of the inexpensive postage stamp. A decision of the Government to carry letter mail by air without a surcharge will in time doubtless come to be regarded as of no less importance.

The transportation of mail without a surcharge by the fastest available mode of transport should benefit all classes. To the rich corporation, as to the less wealthy one and the small businessman, it will be pleasing because of the vastly improved facilities it will offer for correspondence. To everybody it affords a rapid means of communication with distant friends and relatives, a privilege from which many are at present debarred by reason of the surcharge. Lower-cost air postage will give increased energy to trade and will confer many advantages which are in the public interest.

With a view ultimately to transport without surcharge all first-class mail by air, and with a view to increasing the volume of the air-mail carriers, the committee has been urged to make certain recommendations. It is desired by these witnesses that the postal laws should be amended, (a) to repeal the law prescribing a maximum limit on rates paid to air-mail contractors, and (b) to authorize and direct the Postmaster General: (1) To reduce the rate of air-mail postage from 6 to 5 cents per ounce for air-mail letters; (2) to inaugurate and operate air lettergrams for 4 or 3 cents; (3) air-mail post cards for 3 or 2 cents.

The same witnesses believe the Postmaster General should be authorized and directed to establish a few experimental services in order to gather data which might be useful in determining the wisdom of transporting all first-class letter mail by air whenever the time of its transit is sufficiently reduced. It may appear desirable, too, after the present trunk-line air system is more fully provided with an adequate number of schedules on all routes, for the Postmaster General to request Congress to appropriate funds for the establishment of "feeder routes." The advocates of this plan have in mind connecting cities, let us say of 15,000 or more population, with those on the present trunk air-line system.

The members of your committee have been in such intimate touch with a similar problem in connection with ocean-mail carriage that we pretty well understand the attitude of the Post Office Department. It is generally agreed that it is quite unfair to charge against that Deparment the cost of subsidizing ocean or air services. To do so gives a false impression as to the actual cost of operation of the post-office system.

Some method must be found, however, to promote the development of larger, speedier, and, what is far more important, safer aircraft. Without some form of aid this desirable development is unlikely to take place. Of course, it could be encouraged by a Government subsidy and possibly the assistance through payment for air-mail service is the most reasonable method of procedure.

But this involves more careful study than we could give it, and our committee respectfully refers the problem to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Much material of value is to be found in our hearings.

COURT DECISIONS

It seems to your committee that the Air Commerce Act of 1926 was intended to apply to all types of flying on the theory that it is necessary to regulate all types of flying in order to protect interstate commerce. The Supreme Court of California, in Parker v. Granger, has recently decided that Federal air-traffic rules do not apply to intrastate flying. If Federal air-traffic rules do not apply to intrastate flying, and if there are, as in the case in California, no State rules, regulations, or laws, then there is no means by which miscellaneous flying may be controlled. We are well aware of the fact that miscellaneous flying in air-miles is greater than all interstate flying, and has heretofore been unregulated, and that it is considered to be the greatest source of accidents. We recommend that the Department of Commerce make a test case of this decision and take it to the United States Supreme Court before too many of the State courts follow the example of California and build up a formidable body of State laws adverse to public safety.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Because of the lack of proper legislation, the domestic air-transport industry has not had the benefit of properly coordinated Federal regulation. With the air-mail law undergoing fundamental revision every second or third year, and with the suggestion of a periodic reawarding of air-mail contracts by a completely new process of competitive bidding, periodically raising its head, no operator can plan either confidently or intelligently. There is need for an official body which can keep in close touch with the air-transportation situation, watch developments, study the larger problems, foresee dangers which are impending, promote the cause of coordination, and advise both the President and the Congress in regard to air-transportation policies. We agree with that portion of the report (Rept. No. 1329, 74th Cong., 1st sess.) of the Truman committee to the Senate wherein was said concerning air carriers:

"The ultimate objective of the entire program is a system of coordinated transportation for the Nation * * * with earnings which will support adequate credit, and the ability to expand as need develops and to take advantage of all improvements in the art. All parts of such a system of transportation should be in the hands of reliable and responsible operators * * * free from unjust discrimination."

Should it seem wise to turn over to the Interstate Commerce Commission certain functions, there should be left to the Department of Commerce the responsibility for safety. With the Safety Division of the Interstate Commerce Commission there might be placed the responsibility for a decision as to the cause of an air-line accident when an appeal is requested from the decision of the Department of Commerce. Such matters in the case of non-scheduled and private flying should remain in the Department of Commerce.

CONTROL OF SAFETY REGULATIONS

One witness suggested that the law should contain detailed specifications for safety in the air. We cannot agree. The art of aeronautics is changing so speedily that nothing should be done to limit unduly this rapidly changing science. Consequently, in your committee's opinion, statutes pertaining to safety should neither be narrow and restrictive nor too specific. The promotion of safety in the air demands that legislation be solely of a general nature, authorizing and directing the proper regulatory body to specify what is needed for safety, and to alter or amend its regulations and specifications from time to time as conditions change or as the science advances.

THE AUTOGIRO

Like the airplane, the autogiro is a heavier-than-air flying machine. It should be classed with the plane and lighter-than-air ships in a distinct third category. All heavier-than-air machines must maintain forward speed in order to keep aloft. When forward motion ceases, gravity brings them down to earth naturally.

The autogiro, however, with its rotating wings, is able to sustain the necessary forward speed of the vanes or wings, permitting it to maintain the necessary aerodynamic reaction which keeps it in the air. The body or fuselage, at will, may move forward very slowly for a landing, or when hovering over an object. It can virtually float in the air and to all intents and purposes remain poised there if necessary. Obviously such unique, inherent features present vast fields of possibility, and with this in mind great progress has been made in its efficiency and control during the last 5 years, particularly in the United States.

The flyer who uses one of the latest types can settle down for a landing almost anywhere without a greater hazard than would present itself were he to run off the road at 10 miles per hour in his motor car.

Recognizing the peculiar advantages, for particular missions, obtained by using the autogiro, two of our Government agencies are now acquiring, and will soon put to use, this third vehicle of the air. From these operations we should learn the practicability of this machine for taxi work, from terminals to close-in boroughs of large cities, and for special missions requiring slow, low flights, such as rescue and first-aid flights often need.

LIGHTER-THAN-AIR SHIPS

The committee has not given to the subject of transportation by lighter-than-air ships the study it really deserves. Our attention has been directed primarily to the problem of safety involved in the use of heavier-than-air craft. But such incidental consideration as has been given to the problem of safe transportation, and particularly overseas transportation, by lighter-than-air ships has led this committee to the desirability of making certain comments.

It became evident, in the course of the hearings, that the development of the airship in America has been seriously retarded by inactivity on the part of the Government and its agencies. Within the past 4 years the wisdom of undertaking further airship construction for naval and commercial uses has been studied by no less than six independent agencies, excluding our own.

The Joint Committee to Investigate Dirigible Disasters, the Interdepartmental Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, the United States Navy General Board, the Federal Aviation Commission, the Durand Scientific Committee, and the Business Advisory Committee of the Department of Commerce, all forcefully recommended that more airships be built and operated.

The Durand report, which was of particular interest to your committee because of its safety provisions, was transmitted to the Navy Department on January 16, 1936. Apparently no action has as yet been taken on its recommendations. In the meantime, the continued operations of the German Graf Zeppelin and the North Atlantic demonstration flights of the new commercial airship, Hindenburg, have shown conclusively that airships can be operated safely and that large commercial airships show great promise as a safe means for bulk transport over world trade routes.

Our own deliberations on the matter and our studies of testimony and the record indicate that airships can be built safely and operated safely, and that they may be of use to our world trade, to our commerce, and to our national defense. It is equally clear that success can come only after the careful adherence to a complete and continuing program involving research, training, and operational experience.

By section 211 (g) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the Maritime Commission was (1) directed to investigate and determine what provisions of that act and other acts relating to shipping "should be made applicable to aircraft engaged in foreign commerce in order to further the policy expressed in this act, and (2) to recommend appropriate legislation to that end." Pending the detailed investigation and recommendation which the Maritime Commission has been so directed to make, your committee has not deemed it advisable to make specific or detailed recommendation other than the above as to the application of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to airplanes or airships engaged in foreign commerce or as to other possible legislation in regard thereto.

WASHINGTON AND OTHER MAJOR AIRPORTS

Today's airport in our National Capital is not only somewhat unsafe but is also no credit to our country. Croydon, outside of London; LeBourget, outside of Paris; and Templehof, outside of Berlin, are among the finest fields in the world. America has such airports in a few places, as for example, Oakland, Calif. The Capital of our country should have a safe and adequate airport, suitable to the needs of a nation's capital. The death of some official high in the service of our Government should not be necessary to arrive at a solution. This is a subject that has frequently been under discussion by various governmental agencies for a number of years. The situation remains a sorry spectacle. Your committee recommends that the matter of providing the city of Washington with a safe and creditable airport and also a proper auxiliary airport be provided for without further undue delay.

It is now a well-established fact that all major air terminals need not only a close-in airport, but also an auxiliary instrument landing terminal. One should be close-in, or the most convenient airport to the center of the community, and the other ought to be located a considerable distance out in the suburbs, on land possessing all the natural benefits of a safe airport, such as perfect approaches.

The close-in airport should be the best obtainable, but may be subject to limitations and restrictions in bad weather, making it then useless, but of great value in fair weather—90 percent of the time for air lines, the public, and the postal authorities because of its proximity. It should be reserved at all times exclusively for scheduled air transport. On it should be located the main air-mail station for the city.

The auxiliary, adjacent far-out field should normally be confined to private and nonscheduled flying. In bad weather, however, it would be employed by the air lines in blind landings when private fliers are seldom in the air.

Similarly, there are several benefits, not often appreciated, of having a field high, with good approaches and other features for the take-off. In the event of a get-away power diminution or failure, a plane is much better off if it is leaving from a high airport than if it is climbing out of a low one with obstacles about. For these two hazards of flying, the landing and the take-off, a well-located airport is essential to safety. For blind landing it is imperative.

During the last year the trend has been toward using this combination of two airports, notably at Los Angeles, Pittsburgh, Detroit, and the New York metropolitan area, including Newark.

If the Government is to encourage the use by the air lines of such a landing practice, everything possible should be done to make this idea practical and convenient from their standpoint. There are three definite contributions which the Government can make. These will help all fliers and enhance safety.

First. The Government can establish substations for mail, to be located on the auxiliary fields. These would minimize mail delay due to landing at the adjacent field, and it would save the operating companies the expense of trucking the mail to the Post Office.

Second. The Government could equip these alternate fields with every proven blind-landing facility known. This would discourage pilots attempting to get into the fair-weather, close-in airport when conditions were the least doubtful, and at the same time keep the nonscheduled flier isolated from congested air-transport terminal.

Third. The Federal Bureau of Public Roads could instigate a program of constructing the so-called superhighways from one approved far-out field in each large city to the business centers. With no grade crossing to impede traffic, often as much as 30 minutes could thus be saved in getting into town from an airport 10 or more miles out. Much of the disturbing taxi delay now found on landing at an alternate field would vanish.

The matter of traffic control at airports will become a gigantic problem, if private flying and commercial lines develop as anticipated. Your committee feels, therefore, that alternate terminals, especially at large cities, cannot be too strongly urged.

NATIONAL-DEFENSE POLICY

In view of the emphasis rightly placed upon the value of civil aeronautical endeavor in the field of national defense, it may be well to summarize America's policy on this subject. Our national policy contemplates aggressive action against no nation: it is based entirely upon the defense of our homeland and overseas possessions, including protection of our sea- and air-borne commerce. Our existing military policy is founded upon this traditional national policy; it contemplates offensive operations only when such action is necessary as a means of defending our national security. The air units of the Navy and the air units of the Army must be ready at all times for war service. Any great war is now likely to begin with engagements between opposing aircraft, either sea or land based, and early aerial supremacy will be an important factor. An aeronautical program, complete in all essentials, is therefore absolutely essential to the national defense.

The size of the air forces for a major emergency will be vastly greater than it would be prudent to maintain in time of peace. Improvements in airplanes are continuous and relatively rapid. Airplanes become obsolete in a few years and, in some cases, are already obsolescent at the time of quantity delivery. Military airplanes, in time of peace, cannot be advantageously stored in large quantities, as can guns, for example. This is the premise which leads to the conclusion that there must be maintained in time of peace a satisfactory nucleus of a wartime aeronautical force. By a "satisfactory nucleus" is meant a number of aircraft manufacturers and aircraft users distributed over the country and operating on a sound financial basis, creating an industry that is capable of rapid expansion to meet the Government's needs in an emergency. Military aeronautics, in case of a lengthy war, must rely largely upon aircraft built in time of war. Consequently, the general condition, productive capacity, and operative ability of our commercial aircraft establishments are of national concern. In time of peace, America should encourage and never hamper any well-conceived form of commercial endeavor in aeronautics.

MOBILIZATION

Much has been spoken and printed as to the value of our scheduled air-line companies to the country, from the viewpoint of national defense. In national defense practice makes perfect, as it does in anything else in life. It is felt that Congress should appropriate this year, as a part of the War Department bill, sufficient funds so that the President may, during the course of this summer's annual maneuvers, mobilize our scheduled air lines, at least during one or more days. This should be done in order that the War Department may try out the efficacy of such of its mobilization plans as pertain to the use of our domestic air lines in a time of emergency.

RESERVE OF PERSONNEL NOT ON EXTENDED ACTIVE MILITARY DUTY

The large number of pilots and technical personnel engaged in civil and commercial aeronautics constitutes a reserve which is an important factor from the standpoint of national defense. These groups of highly trained citizens should be encouraged to join the Air Corps Reserve, and provision should be made for their annual military training. But your committee cannot agree to the suggestions which have been presented to Congress, that any or all of these pilots or technical personnel who do join the Air Corps Reserve should be paid at a rate different from that applying to other classes of patriotic American citizens who join our military Reserve force. The inadequacy of pay and allowances is but one item of the broader problem for the whole Reserve establishment of the Army at large and of the citizens who join our military Reserve. The Congress should give sympathetic and careful consideration in the preparation of the Nation's financial program for the whole Reserve establishment, but no single class of citizens should be preferred over other classes when brought into the Reserve. Your committee believes that the Reserve component is an essential element of our national-defense system and that it should be given all the support possible. But such support should be consistent with the requirements of our national defense as a whole.

INSTALLATION OF PARACHUTES ON COMMERCIAL AIR LINERS

From year to year various bills contemplating a legislative requirement that parachutes be installed on commercial scheduled air liners have been introduced into Congress. This question has been the subject of consideration by your committee, as well as by the air-transport industry, in its efforts to further increase the safety of air transportation. Your committee is convinced that when the placing of parachutes in passengers' cabins will contribute to safety in air transportation, the air-line industry will automatically and enthusiastically sponsor that provision. Your committee believes that the idea of demanding by legislation that parachutes be installed for passengers on air liners is unsound at this stage in the science of aeronautics. To do this might even detract from existing safety standards rather than enhance them. Our reasoning is along the following lines:

This subject is one which continues to recur for two reasons: (a) The lack of knowledge regarding the technicalities and difficulties involved in the use of parachutes in air emergencies, and (b) well-intentioned persons who desire further safety but who are unfamiliar with the facts.

Before discussing their use, one should review the general history of the use of parachutes. These so-called "lifesavers" of the air began to come into use toward the close of the war. The military services of the United States did not adopt parachutes until about 1922. The nature of military flying justifies the use of parachutes, at least in peacetime. In the course of military maneuvers, involving all kinds of aerobatics, formation flying, and involved tactical maneuvers, in which the danger of collision is always present, the use of parachutes is well worth while.

At about the same time the military services adopted the use of parachutes the air mail was in its infancy. No more hazardous peacetime flying than that of the early air-mail days has ever been done. In this type of flying parachutes were an absolute necessity. It is highly significant that, in respect to military and early air-mail flying, the personnel who wore parachutes were men in the prime of life who had received careful training in their use in an emergency.

As years passed along and aeronautics advanced, the use of parachutes extended into other specialized fields of flying which involved unusual jeopardy. They were used in testing new-type aircraft, private night flying of single-engine airplanes, and private aerobatics. In almost all cases where parachutes were used the wearer took off on every flight with the full knowledge that he was courting the necessity for using a parachute. Thus, being forewarned as it were, these men took pains to be familiar with the manner in which a parachute must be used in order to obtain from it the maximum security. Even in these cases, however, parachutes have not infrequently led men to their death through a sense of false security. This is true because a parachute is not always infallible. The jump must be made at sufficient altitude above the ground to allow time for the parachute to open. The wearer must pull the ring to release the parachute from its pack at the right time. To do this successfully the release must be, first, not too soon, or it will foul the airplane; second, not too late, or it will not open in time to break the fall.

There are several factors which militate against the use of parachutes in commercial air transportation. These may be resolved into three groups: First, the circumstances immediately preceding accidents and under which major transport accidents occur; second, the inherent defects of the parachute itself; third, the psychological reaction of the human being unfamiliar with aeronautics being faced with the contingency of making a parachute jump.

Taking the first group, consider the major air tragedies which have occurred in this country. Without exception, every one of them has so happened that there is no doubt that even the pilot himself had no warning of coming disaster. Certainly in these cases the passengers had no warning either. Air accidents happen in a split second and all is over before there is time for a warning. Under situations of this kind the use of parachutes is impossible.

These tragedies are invariably collisions with the ground. They have taken place under such conditions of terrain and weather that evidence points conclusively to the fact that for some appreciable period before the actual accident occurred the plane was flying so close to the ground that the safe use of parachutes would have been impossible. A careful study of actual forced landings by transport planes, due either to mechanical difficulty or to weather, discloses that in all cases the passengers fared better through remaining with the plane than would have been the case had the passengers attempted to land by parachute.

The parachute as an instrument of life saving is far from the perfect, effective device that its proponents claim. There are constantly recurring accounts of men who lost their lives by placing too much faith in their parachutes. When the emergency arose to necessitate its use the wearer sometimes failed by a fraction of a second to release the rip cord at the proper time, perhaps pulling it too early, with the result that the parachute fouled the plane and dragged the wearer to his death. Also, as has been the case, after jumping and safely opening the parachute the falling plane itself struck the parachute or the wearer, with fatal results. Numerous cases are on record of parachutes failing to open due to their being used at too low an altitude. This last factor, which vitiates the safety of a parachute, is especially pertinent in this consideration. This is so because persons in airplanes, facing an accident on take-off or landing, would be unable to use parachutes even if they had them.

A second factor is the difficulty of egress from an airplane flying at speeds in the neighborhood of 200 miles per hour.

Finally, one must hit the ground. It is of great significance that one landing in a parachute strikes the ground with approximately the same force as if he had made a free jump from a height of about 10 feet. Many skilled jumpers have received serious injuries when they failed to land correctly. Even an expert with a parachute has little or no control over the spot where he will land. The novice has absolutely none. Therefore, a person making his first jump is quite apt to land on the top of a house, or a church, a high-voltage wire, a lake, or some other obstacle promising serious, if not fatal, injury.

It is significant that some wealthy private flyers have equipped their personal airplanes with parachutes, only to meet death without the parachutes being used. An outstanding example of this is the accident last spring of Mr. Fred Harvey and his wife. The airplane flown by Mr. Harvey was equipped with the latest seat-type parachutes and yet, when he found himself in difficulty, there was no attempt to use the parachutes. This is a typical case. Either the accident occurs so quickly that there is no opportunity to use them, or it has been impossible to escape from the airplane due to the force of the air stream.

Almost without exception, persons who have used parachutes in military and commercial flying have been young men, or men in the prime of life, trained in meeting contingencies and facing death calmly. Even such men have faltered at the crucial moment when the use of the parachute meant life or death. The traveling public using the air lines covers the age groups from babes in arms to invalid, elderly persons. It is inconceivable that an average load of air-transport passengers could respond in an emergency with the presence of mind and trained reaction essential to safe use of parachutes. Instead, there is every reason to believe that pandemonium would reign.

A survey of experienced flying men who use the air lines daily in their business will substantiate these views. Almost unanimously these men would prefer to rely on the skill of the pilot to effect a landing than to trust to the additional dangers of using the parachute. Parachutes would, of course, be useful only where there has been abundant warning; but in that event the pilot himself has plenty of warning; he can "let-down" very nearly as slowly as a man in a parachute, and with much better selection of terrain.

GOVERNMENT TRAVEL

Government employees are now authorized to travel by the so-called usual methods of transportation; air travel, by Government employees and at the published tariffs, is authorized only upon the signature of the Secretary of the Department involved. No doubt when railroads were first instituted, many thought that Government employees should confine their travel to the horse and buggy, or to the conveyance moving up and down the inland waterways. Rail travel in the early days was unusual just as air travel some years ago might have been considered to be out of the ordinary. Air travel has now become a necessary part of our daily life. Over a million persons last year used the airplanes to diminish the time required for travel between one point and another. It is the opinion of your committee that the United States needs to augment the usefulness of its employees by declaring by law, if necessary, that air travel is now a "common and ordinary" form of transportation. Governmental employees should be permitted to travel by air, paying the same rate and charges as the general public may pay, and being reimbursed accordingly on their expense accounts when the travel performed is necessary in the Government service. Our regulations in the matter of air travel are still in the "horse and buggy" days. Amendment thereto has already been too long delayed.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN TRADE

So far as Americans are concerned, the only foreign war in which we will engage is the war for world trade. On this account we have, as a nation, the greatest interest in the progress of aviation.

It is not too much to say that in air transport we find the greatest means of advance in foreign commerce since the invention of the steamship. In describing these advancements, it may be well to begin with some reference to actual accomplishments in Latin America, where, under the United States Foreign Mail Act, transport by air has been well established and constantly improved since 1928. Here airways are knitting all the Americas into a closer neighborhood. Pan American Airways has already firmly established its weekly service across the Pacific to Manila, a 6-day flight, is ready to extend it to China, and has taken the necessary steps to make trans-Atlantic service an early reality.

Today the merchant can himself travel, or send his mail or light express, twice a week, from New York to Buenos Aires, via the west coast of South America, in 4½ days. The route is as follows: By Eastern Air Lines, New York to Miami; thence by Pan American Airways, via Cuba, Jamaica, and Colombia, to the Panama Canal; and by Pan American-Grace Airways from the Canal down to the west coast to Santiago, and over the Andes to Buenos Aires. Rio de Janeiro, on the east coast, is but 4½ days from New York by domestic air lines and Pan American Airways; and Buenos Aires, 5½ days. Barranquilla, Colombia, is now less than 24 hours by air from New York; Panama less than a day and a half; Guayaquil, Ecuador, is only 2 days; and Lima, Peru, 2½ days.

An air-mail letter mailed in New York before 6 p. m. on Friday or Monday, will reach Buenos Aires at 12:45 p. m. (i. e., 45 minutes after noon) on the following Wednesday or Saturday. To Santiago, Chile, the scheduled time is only 4 days; and as the north-bound mail departs the following day, it is possible to write from New York and to receive a reply within 9 days.

All these flights are entirely by daylight. There are no lighted airways in Latin America similar to those provided through the United States by the United States Government.

It is probable that the present time of 4½ days from New York to Buenos Aires, via the west coast, can be cut to 3½ days, with little or no night flying except over water. If and when night flying becomes practicable, 2½ days will probably become a reality.

To countries close to the United States the saving in time is correspondingly impressive. Pan American Airways has daily service from Brownsville, Tex., to Mexico City, and three trips a week via Central America to the Panama Canal. Its planes fly daily to Cuba and twice a week to Jamaica and Barranquilla, Colombia. The passenger leaving New York on Monday or Friday evening will spend the next night in Barranquilla, principal city of northern Colombia. East coast service links up Puerto Rico, Santo Domingo, Haiti, and the northern coast of Brazil in an amazing way, stimulating to commercial and social intercourse.

The steadily mounting volume of air mail on all routes to South America is evidence of the daily utilization of this method of transportation by merchants, officials, and individuals. The volume of air-express traffic is likewise expanding. In Peru, Pan American-Grace Airways has transported heavy mining machinery to points high in the mountains, formerly accessible only by pack animals, which were, of course, incapable of carrying anything but light machinery parts. The trimotor Ford, formerly used for mail service and which is now displaced by the Douglas land transports and Sikorsky amphibians on the international service, can easily lift single pieces weighing as much as a ton and a half. They can set them down in these remote locations, there to crush gold and silver ore in mines which could not be worked by the light machinery to which the operation was formerly confined.

Formerly business executives planning a trip around Latin Amercia had to allow not less than 2 months, of which more than half would be spent at sea. Today they can make the same trip by air with the same stop-overs in one-third of the time, due to the fact that there is service six times a week to Mexico, five times a week to the Panama Canal, twice a week to the east coast as far south as Rio de Janeiro, and once a week thence to Buenos Aires; and twice a week to the Panama Canal, down the west coast, and over the Andes to Buenos Aires and Montevideo.

There has been introduced a flexibility of travel hitherto unknown. In South America proper it is possible to stop over almost anywhere for 3 or 4 days, taking the next following plane; or, for those who do not care to fly all the way, day after day, a combined sea and air voyage can be arranged, enjoying the best features of both. Or those traveling by sea can make a swift return home by air in case of need. Combination steamer and air journeys are a feature of the travel industry.

Overseas air transport has not yet reached the point where it can wholly sustain itself commercially. It will be a considerable time before it can become self-supporting in foreign trade, where service is necessarily less frequent than in the United States, thus entailing a much heavier per-mile charge for overhead. Every one of the great nations has found it necessary to subsidize the construction and operation of their fleets engaged in international air commerce. If the United States desires aircraft to carry its commerce, and if it desires to maintain the American wage scale, both in its aircraft factories and in the air, it is apparent that Government aid is still required for air carriers engaged in international air commerce. The great strides already made were based on financial aid from the Government in the form of mail contracts, not merely to pay for the cost of carrying the mail, but to encourage the development of the art of flying.

There are 261,000 miles of air lines outside of the United States. There are 104 foreign-scheduled air carriers outside of the United States and 3 American companies. Scheduled air lines operate under 47 different flags.

ALASKA

Your committee is convinced that the development of the vast Territory of Alaska, one-fifth the size of the entire United States, depends upon a more adequate communication and transportation service. Due to the unusual terrain, it is impractical and uneconomical to provide highways and additional railroads. The airplane is, without doubt, the solution of that transportation problem. Air transportation in northern Canada, in the mountainous and undeveloped countries of South America, and elsewhere, has amply proven this fact. Even in these days when rigid economy in Government seems desirable, we would appear to be short-sighted if provision for additional transportation and communication service in Alaska were not made.

At the present time most of Alaska's airplane services are provided in the main during the winter season only; the frequency of the service on the existing routes ranges from once a week to once a month. A majority of the 29 air-line companies operating in Alaska are forced by lack of aids to navigation to have a lesser frequency of operation than once a week.

In addition to providing, at what is a small cost, better transportation and communication by air across Alaska, provision should be made for a greater frequency of service. The reasons for this statement are beyond debate. It is recommended that the present Congress provide an appropriation for "foreign" air mail between Juneau and Fairbanks, Alaska.

The Post Office Department might well request an amendment to the Alaska star-route law which will permit the Postmaster General to provide reasonable surcharges on mail carried by air over those air lines. By so doing the Department will receive additional postal receipts to such an extent as perhaps to repay the Federal Government for the appropriation we suggest. What is even more important, such a surcharge will avoid the loading down of the airplanes with mail-order-house catalogs and similar articles which seriously affect the opportunities for the carrying of passengers, as well as seriously affecting the revenues of the contractors. Bidders on air-mail contracts will be relieved of the necessity of making higher bids for the transportation of air mail than would otherwise be the case. Alaskan officials, representatives of the various chambers of commerce, and the Alaskan public in general have indicated that they would be glad to pay a reasonable surcharge on Alaskan air mail.

We have suggested, under the subject of "airway aids", that generous appropriation be made for airway aids in Alaska. These are needed, not only to cover the needs of national defense but to make possible the only feasible transportation system that can be installed to develop this great country.

NONSCHEDULED AND PRIVATE FLYING AND ACCIDENTS

Nonscheduled flying, including private flying, employs more pilots, more aircraft, and flies more miles than the scheduled air lines. Accordingly it has been given considerable consideration in your committee's study of safety in the air. The nonscheduled commercial branch of flying comprises flying schools, charter or air-taxi operators, photographic flyers, and, in fact, all flying for hire or reward which is not performed on regular schedule. Private flying comprises aircraft operating strictly for sport or business, analogous to the use of privately owned automobiles used for pleasure and convenience.

The fatal-accident record of nonscheduled flying on a plane-mile basis, as recently as the calendar year 1936, has been but one-fourteenth as favorable as that of scheduled flying. This makes it important for a committee dealing with safety in the air, seriously to consider private flying.

There is a national lack of appreciation of the importance of nonscheduled flying. Nonscheduled flyers in 1929 supported aeronautical manufacturing with an annual output materially greater than that expended by the military and naval air forces combined. Yet today this nonscheduled output is less than 5 percent of the production for military purposes.

The Government has not only a direct function in private and miscellaneous flying but, indirectly, private flying has an important bearing on scheduled air-line flying. If America is going to have a great aeronautical industry, comparable to the motor industry, for example, we must have private flying. In the United States the future of the aeronautical industry and its relationship to our problems of national defense are dependent upon private flying.

Private flying cannot become popular until the aeronautical industry sells safe, comfortable, and inexpensive airplanes. Safe, comfortable, and inexpensive airplanes cannot be produced until private flying becomes popular. Somewhere that vicious circle must be broken. Your committee fee's that it will be broken at two points. First, as the airplane-manufacturing companies become economically more independent they will have more money to spend for experimental work. Second, the Government can and should take an important and definite step by providing for private flying the air-navigation facilities, including landing areas, that are lacking today. In this latter connection your committee heard testimony on so-called flight strips to be located in favorable localities, perhaps adjacent to highways. There are advantages and disadvantages in this subject which the recommended Bureau of Federal Airways in the Department of Commerce might profitably study as a possible solution to a future imminent traffic problem and as a possible attribute to national defense.

The basic problem of safety in flight is that of the airplane itself. It still has an inherent weakness which continues to be a matter for aerodynamical study, in order to bridge over the gap between the expert and the layman pilot. An airplane must maintain a certain speed in flight, otherwise control is lost. Aeronautical engineers and research facilities the world over have been working for many years to eliminate this basic defect. Undoubtedly the day will come when this defect in present-day aircraft will be eliminated. Perhaps its elimination may come with the development of the private airplane used by laymen pilots. The autogiro gives great promise in this direction. Should this most desirable discovery be made, whether in the operation of the private, inexpensive airplane or some other, it will be quickly applied to air-transport airplanes. We believe that American airplanes and equipment are, in general, equal to any in the world, but they can and must be improved.

The statistics in the table which follows show the accidents and fatalities in both nonscheduled and scheduled operation. The inability to make properly the important and essential inspections is responsible for many of these accidents. It was asserted by witnesses before your committee that the failure of the function of inspection was due to a shortage of inspectors. This is an unfavorable record as compared to the corresponding situation during the years from the time the Air Commerce Act was enacted in 1926 until 1933.

It is evident that accidents have occurred because the nonscheduled flyer was not equipped for use of, or by inexperience was unable to utilize, air-navigation aids. Further evidence indicates that these aids do not function always, or else they function so inaccurately as not to be relied upon implicity. As in scheduled flying, the record of accidents in nonscheduled flying shows that many accidents would not have occurred had the ground aids to air navigation been kept up to date and properly maintained.

Germaine to our investigation is the relative volume of air passengers carried by scheduled and nonscheduled operators. Even in 1932, at its lowest ebb, nonscheduled flying carried over twice as many passengers as were carried on our scheduled air lines. It has been estimated that 75 percent of the former type of passengers were pay passengers. As regards the number of plane-miles flown, it should likewise be noted that nonscheduled flying greatly exceeds scheduled air-line flying. In this connection, however, it should be mentioned that nonscheduled flying involved about 13,818 pilots and 6,912 airplanes, as compared with approximately 987 pilots and 459 airplanes employed by scheduled air lines.

Although nonscheduled flying exceeds that of scheduled air-line flying as regards plane-miles flown per year, it must be pointed out very definitely that most of the nonscheduled flying is accomplished by daylight and almost always under favorable atmospheric conditions. Until our Federal airways shall have been more nearly completed, the opportunity for extension of miscellaneous flying under all atmospheric conditions, and at night, will necessarily be restricted.

The failure to exert every effort to prevent accidents in nonscheduled flying, and the fact that accidents have resulted in consequence, create a situation which has reacted unfavorably upon the passenger volume of all forms of civil aeronautics. The Bureau of Air Commerce general inspection service, which concerns itself with all forms of inspection of aircraft and personnel, other than in scheduled operations, has been forced drastically to curtail its activities in the field. This reduction has gone on to such an extent that innumerable justified complaints have been received over the lack of service rendered.

In a few instances accidents resulting in fatalities can be traced to lack of suitable inspection. There are no extra or replacement aircraft or personnel inspectors in many sections of the United States. In an emergency due to illness, special service, vacations, etc., extra work is required of the remaining inspection personnel, with consequent fatigue and jeopardy to safety. The present aeronautical inspection force in the field is not sufficient to render the services intended by the Air Commerce Act of 1926.

A great many of the nonscheduled aircraft annually presented for inspection prior to relicensing are old models and types, the age of which demands not only careful inspection but more frequent inspection. This is not possible with the present limited number of personnel available. The surprising feature about the whole situation in this matter of aircraft inspection is that there has not been more criticism, and even more deaths in nonscheduled flying. Not only should additional inspectors be provided, but ample provision should be made for them to cover their itineraries without loss of time. We know how important automobile inspection is regarded to be; infinitely more important is inspection of vehicles that are to fly the air.

RECAPITULATION AND FINAL RECOMMENDATIONS

Commercial aviation is under the purview of the Department of Commerce. The Air Commerce Act of 1926 provides the authority. It makes it the duty of the Secretary to foster, regulate, and supervise aeronautics. Therefore, we must look to the Department of Commerce for any governmental derelictions or failures in the field.

The Senate resolution under which we are acting directed your committee "to investigate fully and thoroughly interstate air commerce, the precautions and safeguards provided therein, both by those engaged in such interstate air transportation and by officials or departments of the United States Government; and to investigate fully and thoroughly the activities of those entrusted by the Government with the protection of property and life by air transportation, and the degree, adequacy, and efficiency of supervision by any agency of Government, including inspection and frequency thereof, and to take testimony in all respects in relation to any of the matters herein indicated and in relation to any subject related thereto."

In our preliminary report we recommended certain changes in the personnel of the Bureau of Air Commerce. As we understand it, the Department of Commerce, having examined the situation and given it special study, decided to reorganize its aviation set-up. It would seem to us that the Department is acting wisely, provided that the proper segregation of duties, as suggested in this report, be observed, and that competent personnel, possessing due authority and responsibility, be apppointed.

Assuming that the reorganization be effected, it will go far toward solving the difficulties of aeronautics. Your committee's full recommendations, however, go beyond and outside the Department of Commerce.

In the second part of the Senate resolution under which your committee is acting it was made our duty to "determine what legislation, if any, shall be adopted in the interest of safety of life and property transported in interstate air commerce, and what legislation, if any, shall be adopted to prevent accidents in the air and provide appropriate safeguards for their prevention."

As we have said in the body of the report, there is need for legislation in several fields. Organization alone might have cured most of the ills within the Department of Commerce itself, but there are major functions to be performed which do not belong in that one Department.

It is a fact that the Government's relationship to civil aeronautics has not been in the very best interests of safety. For example, a mail contractor may obligate himself with the Postmaster General to fly the mail at a fixed rate. Then another Department, for safety's sake, suddenly forces that contractor to spend a large portion of his income on matters not contemplated in the contract. Obviously, money intended for maintenance cannot then be so used unless the contractor has sufficient resources to operate in the "red".

While the responsibilities of different Government agencies are interlocking and sometimes interdependent, yet they must be segregated and kept apart to avoid confusion. We have found it as difficult to define their function clearly as it has been to allocate them wisely.

It became necessary first to place them in six distinct categories, all vital and indispensable to progress in flying, yet each as distinct from the other as a court of law is from the litigant body appearing before it. These we listed as follows: (a) Fundamental research; (b) quasi-judicial functions; (c) control and safety; (d) fostering and development; (e) coordination of research, experimentation, and service testing; (f) direct subvention or cash payments for service. Under each of these comes the multitudinous duties listed in the attached chart.

We believe it impracticable to attempt at this time to place all Federal powers pertaining to civil aeronautics in a new and separate agency of the Government, such as the Federal Aviation Commission recommended. The problem of transportation will soon become a major one for national consideration. For the present it seems wise to fit these duties into their logical assignment in our present grid of government. We have completed or have in formulation various bills which we shall later ask to have appropriately referred.

While your committee has made various recommendations which it believes to be essential to safety, nevertheless, from among these various recommendations, two stand out in your committee's judgment as so important and so essential that we may classify them as emergency measures on which immediate action is imperative. These two are as follows:

1. Governmental reorganization: The Secretary of Commerce should put into effect the recommendations submitted herewith or in our preliminary report, if he has not already done so. (See p. 3 hereof.) Especially should the provisions of section 9, page 4, House Document No. 69, Seventy-third Congress, first session, be rescinded in order that the position of the Assistant Secretary of Commerce may be utilized for the purpose for which the office was created and intended. The time has not yet arrived when the far-sighted judgment expressed by Congress on this subject during 1926 can be set aside. The emergency that necessitated the use of that office for other duties has ended. To restore this official, or to establish a free-handed substitute action, will do more to solve the troubles in civil aeronautics and within the Department of Commerce than would anything else. (See chart on page 2433.)

2. Appropriations: From the viewpoint of safety, efficiency, and continued progress in this newest mode of transportation and as a supplement to national defense, your committee feels the most pressing action facing the present Congress is that set forth on page 19 of this report, wherein we have recommended the immediate appropriation of $12,414,000, to become available at once and to remain available until expended, for the purpose of appropriating funds essential to three items: Aids, weather, and personnel. Nothing that the Congress can do is more important than this one imperative matter upon which action must be taken forthwith.

We submit this second report so that Congress and the public may mark the progress our committee is making to render air transportation more safe and dependable.

"MORRO CASTLE" AND "MOHAWK" INVESTIGATIONS—PRINTING OF PRELIMINARY REPORT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the next place, with the same comment that I neglected to ask that the report from the Committee on Commerce on the Morro Castle and Mohawk investigations be printed in the RECORD, I wish now to make that request. This is an appropriate time to do so, because, as the Senators from Texas have said, the whole Nation mourns over the terrible disaster in that State. We were all profoundly shocked by this tragic disaster, involving the loss of the lives of several hundred children and many teachers. It will be recalled that in the Morro Castle accident the lives of 134 citizens were destroyed. I ask that the report to which I have referred be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report (S. Rept. No. 184) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Supplementing the committee's reports, no. 776, submitted June 3, 1935; no. 776, part 2, submitted February 6, 1936; no. 776, part 3, submitted May 20, 1936; and no. 776, part 4, submitted June 20, 1936, the following additional preliminary report is submitted, with particular reference to those portions of Senate Resolution 7, requiring "(3) to investigate the adequacy and enforcement of the present legal standards of safety of ship construction and operation"; "(5) to investigate the adequacy and efficiency of the Steamboat Inspection Service"; and "recommendations for necessary legislation."

HISTORY

From the standpoint of safety of life at sea, the construction and the inspection of ships are, perhaps, of more importance than any other subjects to be considered. This is true because the hazards of the sea often produce situations with which it is impossible for even the best of men to cope unless they have under them vessels which are able to withstand and survive the hazards. This has been recognized for many years, and was brought into particular prominence by the loss of the Titanic on April 14, 1912, with the loss of 1,517 lives. After this disaster to a ship, which was supposed at that time to be unsinkable, a conference was held in London for the purpose of arriving at some international agreement on the method of subdividing ships so as to improve their safety and preclude another similar disaster.

The convention resulting from this conference was signed in 1914, but, due to the war and other circumstances, it was never ratified and put into effect, although some of the maritime nations utilized, in their laws, portions of the convention resulting from the conference. The convention was reflected in some of our seaman's legislation and in our statutes regarding lifesaving equipment, but was not utilized to better our laws regarding ship construction.

CONVENTION FOR PROMOTING SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA, 1929

After a lapse of 15 years another Conference on Safety of Life at Sea was held in London; the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929, embodied the conclusions reached. This convention was finally ratified by the United States last year and, as it has now been ratified by all the signatory nations and adherence signified by many others, its requirements apply to most of the ships engaged in international voyages the world over. This convention marked a forward step in the safeguarding of life and property at sea; to a great extent the advances in the construction standards agreed upon were due to the efforts of the delegation from the United States.

RECENT PASSENGER SHIPS OF THE UNITED STATES

It so happens that most of the important passenger ships built in this country since 1929, were built with Government aid. Consequently the Shipping Board (and its successors) was able to control the design to a certain extent. Therefore, the vessels comply, in general, with the requirements of the 1929 convention, although it had not been ratified by the United States when the ships were built. Though not required by our statutes, it was made possible only because the Government, in the case of these ships, held the purse strings.

PRESENT SITUATION

The Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929, which became effective in this country on November 7, 1936, does not represent the best that could be done in the way of building ships even in 1929. But it does represent the best that could be agreed upon at an international conference where many diverse interests had to be reconciled. Over 7 years elapsed between the dates of our signing the convention and our making it effective, and it is, therefore, much less representative of the best practice than it was when it was signed. Another consideration in connection with the convention, is that in most of the maritime nations the only large important ships operated are those engaged in international voyages and they are all governed by the convention requirements. The United States is in quite another situation on account of the importance of its domestic trade in which many passenger ships are engaged. They are frequently larger and carry more passengers than many of the ships engaged in international voyages, but the convention does not apply to them.

OUR PRESENT LAWS

In making the study, required by Senate Resolution 7, in the words "to investigate the adequacy and enforcement of the present legal standards of safety of ship construction and operation", it soon became evident that our laws were defective in many respects and that a general revision was desirable. The ratification of the convention of 1929 has resulted only in a marked contrast between our requirements for ships which go to foreign countries, where they must meet the international regulations, and the equally important ships which engage in our domestic commerce and, therefore, are not required to satisfy the regulations of any foreign nation. In addition to this, most of our present laws are very general and, in most cases, no standards are set up for the guidance of the administering officials.

When our investigation began it soon became evident that the requirements of the laws which were then on the statute books were entirely inadequate to ensure safe ships. It was evident also that the requirements were below those of the other maritime nations, so that such vessels as the Mohawk could be built without any contravention of our laws. In addition to this, the inspection of our vessels was inadequate and their design and construction was controlled to a very limited extent.

While our investigation was in progress, a number of changes and revisions were made in our laws for the purpose of improving the organization of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation. They also give authority for demanding further safeguards in the construction and operation of ships. Until now, no proper standards have been established, or they are too vague in their meaning.

It will be seen that since our investigation commenced, the 1929 convention has been made effective and some improvements have been made in our laws. But at the very beginning of the investigation it was evident that our laws, and the rules and regulations promulgated in accordance with them, were so far below the international standards that a fundamental revision was necessary. The best method of approaching this revision was studied. It was decided that it would be logical first to draw up a set of rules for the construction, operation, and inspection of ships, and from these rules draft the necessary legislation. Surely this is wiser than attempting to draw up legislation, which might or might not be complete, and then have that legislation interpreted in the form of rules.

As the questions involved were of a very technical nature, it was necessary to ask the assistance of certain qualified technical experts to prepare the fundamental rules required.

TECHNICAL COMMITTEE

Having reached this conclusion, the investigating committee invited the following qualified technical men to assist:

Rear Admiral George H. Rock (Construction Corps), United States Navy (retired), Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers.

Mr. H. Gerrish Smith, National Council of American Shipbuilders.

Mr. William Francis Gibbs, naval architect.

Mr. George G. Sharp, naval architect.

Mr. J. Lewis Luckenbach, American Bureau of Shipping.

Mr. J. B. Weaver, Department of Commerce (Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation).

Mr. H. L. Seward, Department of Commerce (U. S. Shipping Board Bureau).

Capt. A. H. Van Keuren (Construction Corps), United States Navy, Navy Department.

Commander H. T. Smith, United States Navy, Navy Department.

Commander Herbert N. Perham, United States Coast Guard, Treasury Department.

Lt. Comdr. Edward M. Webster, United States Coast Guard (retired), Federal Communications Commission.

Mr. Turner W. Battle, Department of Labor.

(NOTE.—The Government officials were designated by the heads of their respective departments.)

The technical committee elected Admiral George H. Rock as chairman; Prof. H. L. Seward, of Yale University, representing the United States Shipping Board Bureau, as vice chairman; and Capt. C. S. Joyce, United States Navy (retired), as secretary. At a later date Captain Joyce, at the request of the chairman, was appointed a member of the committee.

This group was called the Technical Committee on Safety at Sea, and was first convened on June 17, 1935. At this meeting the chairman of the subcommittee charged with making the investigation required by Senate Resolution 7 (Senator COPELAND) made the following statement:

"Under Senate Resolution 7, this committee was directed to investigate the Morro Castle and Mohawk disasters and various related matters and to make recommendations for necessary legislation. A preliminary report of the committee's investigation has been submitted to the Senate which contains most of the committee's findings to date.

"It must be evident to anyone familiar with the situation that neither our laws nor our methods of enforcing our laws covering the construction and operation of ships are as effective as they should be. It is clearly the duty of this committee to propose legislation which will improve the situation and place the United States on a parity with other maritime nations in this respect.

"Early in the committee's investigation it became clear that certain remedial steps should and could be taken without further delay; these may be briefly set forth as follows:

"(1) Ratify the Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea (1929). This convention is not in the hands of this committee, but every effort will be made to have it ratified.

"(2) To frame legislation to implement the convention, making sure that where the convention and our present laws are at variance the more stringent shall govern.

"(3) To frame such legislation as will ensure our ships being superior to the convention wherever, in the light of our present knowledge, the convention is not sufficiently stringent.

"(4) If the convention fails of ratification; to frame such legislation as will make our ships comply with the best modern practice, so that if we cannot have all the advantages accruing from adherence to the convention, we can at least have safe ships.

"(5) To frame legislation which will make the rules for new ships apply, so far as may be found practicable, to the ships already constructed and in operation.

"(6) To frame legislation which will ensure our ships being manned by adequate and competent crews and to ensure these crews being properly inspected.

"(7) To frame legislation which will put the licensing of ships' officers on a modern basis.

"(8) To frame legislation which will place the Bureau, now known as the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, on such a basis as will give us confidence that it can function in an efficient manner in carrying out its duties from both a technical and an administrative standpoint. To effect this not only proper organization is required, but also efficient and properly compensated personnel.

"It will be seen that the committee's program falls into two classes: One deals with the material phases of ship design and construction, and the other with the personnel and administrative phases.

"You gentlemen have been invited here to assist the committee, primarily in connection with the phases of the legislation having to do with matériel. In inviting you, the committee had in mind assembling a group that would be abstractly and disinterestedly committed to producing the best and most practicable legislation to fit our present needs. It is taken for granted, of course, that those of you who represent Government departments are prepared to approach the matter without prejudice. We are confident that those of you who do not represent Government agencies will approach the matter in the same spirit of patriotism.

"The committee's first effort will be toward drafting a set of rules for the construction of new ships, rules which will cover everything that goes to make up a safe and efficient ship for the service intended. With these rules as a basis it is proposed to prepare legislation setting forth compactly the minimum requirements.

"It is proper to say for the committee that it is convinced that ship safety, both as to construction and operation, can only be attained when the proper Government department has authority to enforce and the responsibility for enforcing the laws. This responsibility cannot be divided.

"In connection with the reorganization of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, several bills have been submitted by the Bureau and are now pending. So far as the committee can determine at this time, these do not cover the situation as a whole. It is our desire to have your advice in these matters.

"In the name of the committee I thank you for the sacrifices you are making in doing this work. The increased safety of the traveling public and of American seamen will be ample reward, I am sure."

The chairman then handed the committee the following agenda and asked them to be guided thereby:

TENTATIVE AGENDA FOR TECHNICAL COMMITTEE

"(1) To prepare a comprehensive set of rules for the construction of all classes of new vessels concerning structural strength, loading, watertight subdivision, stability under all conditions, fire-resisting qualities, fire-fighting equipment, lifesaving equipment, equipment for communications, electrical equipment, navigational equipment, bilge and fire pumps, propelling machinery, ground tackle, and such other features as may be necessary to insure properly equipped and safe ships.

"(a) The vessels covered by these rules are to be divided into classes, in accordance with the purpose and service for which intended, and the rules are to be so drawn as to assure the vessels being in all respects equal to, or, so far as the present development of the art and the cost of construction will permit, superior to the best required by the laws of any nation.

"(2) To prepare a comprehensive set of rules governing the safety requirements for all vessels already constructed and in service, so as to make them comply with the rules for new vessels as nearly as may be found possible in each case.

"(3) To prepare a comprehensive set of rules for the material inspection of all vessels which will insure their complying, in all respects, with the requirements of the rules prepared under paragraphs (1) and (2) above."

In accordance with this agenda, the technical committee has made a thorough study of the subject covering a period of about 18 months. It has prepared rules to cover all features of the construction of modern ships, in order that they may be, first, at least equal to the requirements of the 1929 convention; and, second, as much better than the convention requirements as is practicable in the light of our present knowledge of the art. These rules cover the construction and equipment of ships in all respects.

For the hull, they cover structural strength, subdivision, stability, subdivision load lines, fireproofing, ventilation, fire detection, and fire extinction. For the engineering portion, they cover boilers and pressure vessels, piping, main propelling machinery, electrical machinery and equipment, and auxiliaries, such as emergency generators, bilge pumps, fire pumps, steering gear, boat winches, anchor windlasses, etc. For lifesaving equipment, they cover boats, rafts, buoyant apparatus, life preservers, life buoys, water lights, line-throwing guns, etc. For other equipment, they cover compasses, sounding apparatus, navigational equipment, anchors, cables, hawsers, etc. For communications (except radio), they cover signal lights, signal flags, interior communications, etc. For inspections, they cover the inspection at the time of building, the periodical (annual) inspection, and special inspections when accident or other cause requires them.

The final report of the Technical Committee on Safety at Sea is appended hereto and, in addition to the rules prepared, this report gives a summary of the studies made and the general conclusions reached. As was to be expected, two of the most interesting studies made were those connected with preventing a fire, such as the one which destroyed the Morro Castle, occurring on a passenger ship and the prevention of a minor collision, such as occurred on the Mohawk, resulting in the ship sinking with terrible loss of life.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Having prepared these rules, the legislation necessary to put them into effect has been drafted. This legislation follows in general the requirements of the convention, but is somewhat more advanced in certain particulars. It reduces the number of passengers allowed to be carried on a cargo ship, from the 16 allowed by our present law to the 12 allowed internationally. The application of the law follows the requirements of the convention, but is somewhat more explicit regarding their application to existing ships.

For convenience in administration, the vessels have been grouped in such a fashion as to make the administration of the act more satisfactory.

STRUCTURAL STRENGTH

The legislation requires the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation to promulgate satisfactory rules, covering all phases of ship construction and ship inspection, so that all concerned may know the requirements. Regarding structural strength, the legislation places the responsibility for the strength of vessels primarily upon the Bureau; the decision in this connection is to be based, in principle, upon the Load Line Convention, making it possible, in the case of a vessel classed by the American Bureau of Shipping, for the Government Bureau to accept the strength of the vessel so classed as being satisfactory. This was agreed to, because of the fact that the American Bureau of Shipping requirements for strength have proven satisfactory over a long period.

SUBDIVISION

In the case of subdivision, the responsibility for seeing that passenger ships are properly subdivided is placed on the Bureau; the collision which caused the sinking of the Mohawk and resulted in the loss of 45 lives, indicated a condition which exists in many of our ships, i. e., lack of proper subdivision for preventing a minor collision from resulting in the loss of the vessel. The proposed legislation places the responsibility for seeing that passenger ships are properly subdivided on the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation. The requirements, while they closely follow the principles set forth in the convention, are as much more stringent as we believe it practicable to demand at this time. The improvement over the convention is not great, but with the great diversity of opinion on a controversial subject, we went as far in the direction of stringent requirements as could be agreed upon by all members of the technical subcommittee.

Ships are normally subdivided by athwartships watertight bulkheads which extend from the bottom of the ship to a deck, well above the water line which is known as the bulkhead deck. The degree of subdivision depends on the number of bulkheads installed. As a practical matter the number of bulkheads that can be installed, and still have useful cargo holds, depends on the length of the ship. Where a ship carries a large number of passengers, however, the safeguarding of their lives becomes more important than mere convenience in carrying cargo. The degree of subdivision provided varies with the maximum number of passengers the ship is authorized to carry, the length of the ship, and with the service in which it is to operate; the highest degree of subdivision corresponds with the ships of the greatest length carrying the greatest number of passengers. The legislation provides that no passenger ship can operate unless, as minimum requirement, she is so subdivided by bulkheads as to permit any single watertight compartment in the ship to be flooded without the ship sinking, and without causing her to change trim or to list to a dangerous degree. This in theory would prevent a repetition of the Mohawk disaster, but only if the ship is holed in a single compartment as was the case on the Mohawk.

In a collision there is always a chance that the damage will occur at one of the bulkheads thus causing two adjacent compartments to be flooded; if this happens to a ship, built to stand having only one compartment flooded, it will sink just as the Mohawk did. In existing ships it may not be practicable to rearrange the hull structure so as to permit two adjacent compartments to be flooded without sinking, but it is right to demand that they be altered so that at least one compartment can be flooded with reasonable safety. In new ships of the Mohawk type, it is fair to demand that they be so constructed as to permit at least two adjacent compartments to be flooded without loss of the vessel.

STABILITY

In the matter of stability the legislation goes beyond the convention, because at the conference it was impossible to develop the proper means of arriving at a rule for the stability of ships in a damaged condition. But it is believed the requirements of the legislation we propose can readily be met, and that these requirements are a distinct advance in the field of safety at sea. This is true because they will preclude a ship when damaged to the extent for which she is designed, changing trim, listing, or sinking to such an extent as to become unsafe or to make it impossible to lower and handle the lifeboats.

SUBDIVISION LOAD LINES

As in the convention, the proposed legislation requires that passenger ships have load lines based on their subdivision. The load line must be sufficiently below the bulkhead deck, so that when a ship is damaged by collision or otherwise it will not sink to a degree that permits the water to run over the bulkhead deck into other compartments.

PROTECTION AGAINST FIRE

The fire which destroyed the Morro Castle resulted in the loss of 124 lives. While her construction was much the same as that used in other vessels of her date, it is evident that the practice of filling a large ship with very inflammable woodwork is not based on any consideration of safety to the passengers. The fire on the Morro Castle showed clearly what might happen on almost any of the passenger ships now afloat. It indicated that some practicable method of construction must be devised to eliminate the woodwork and other combustible materials heretofore used in the construction of passenger ships.

It was fortunate indeed that Mr. George G. Sharp, who has given more study to the question of fireproofing ships than anyone else in this country, was a member of the technical committee. We are glad he was willing to undertake the investigation required.

Through the cooperation of the Secretary of Commerce, the Merchant Fleet Corporation furnished a ship and the necessary money for conducting a number of tests which covered all phases of fireproofing and fire protection. A great advantage resulted from the use of an actual steel ship for these tests. In the first place, having a fire confined between the steel decks and the steel sides of the ship soon demonstrated that some materials, which appeared to be satisfactory from laboratory tests ashore, would not do on shipboard. They gave off such quantities of fumes that it was found impossible to approach even a minor fire to extinguish it.

During the course of the experiments, a form of construction was developed in which combustible material was eliminated to such an extent that combustion cannot be sustained by any part of the ship's structure. Thus a distinct advance has been made in the requirements for the fireproofing of passenger vessels. The requirements of the convention in this respect were quite elementary, and since that document was signed, considerable knowledge has been gained. Materials are now available which make it possible to arrive at the construction of a fireproof passenger ship without increasing materially the cost or weight. The fireproofing methods used ashore are practically debarred on account of the great weight involved. Shore methods are not necessary because ship construction is quite different from land construction; on this account it is not necessary to protect the steel structure of a ship, as is the practice on land. In fact, the steel structure of a ship almost never loses its integrity due to fire.

The problem then is to reduce to a minimum the amount of material which will support combustion. This is made difficult due to the fact that weight is such an important factor. It would be impossible to fireproof a modern passenger ship by the methods used ashore. The added weight would greatly decrease the carrying capacity of the ship, and, due to the fact that much of the added weight would be in the upper part of the vessel, would so raise the center of gravity as to make her unstable and unsafe. The search has been for materials and forms of construction which would retard the spread of fire and still remain within the weight requirements for ships.

FIRE DETECTION AND EXTINCTION

The fire-detection requirements follow in general the requirements of the convention, but they are somewhat more explicit. They differ from the conventional practice because our ships will be materially less liable to fire.

In the matter of fire extinction, the legislation goes somewhat beyond the convention and considerably beyond our present laws. The requirements for fire pumps, fire mains, hose connections, fire extinguishers, etc., coupled with the improved construction, are such as practically to ensure no dangerous fire.

ENGINEERING

The legislation covers certain requirements, especially as regards fire pumps, bilge pumps, and emergency generators, so as to follow the convention, and in some cases to improve convention requirements. It also requires the inspection of all essential machinery on shipboard. In the past the inspections, so far as engineering matters are concerned, were confined to boilers, pressure vessels, and piping, and also to a certain extent to fire pumps, but there was no specific requirement for the inspection of other machinery. It is the intention of this legislation, therefore, to cover all machinery used on board ship in order that the ends of safety may be served.

All of the main propelling machinery and the auxiliary machinery necessary to keep it in operation are of great importance. The electrical machinery and equipment are becoming more and more important, and should be given special attention, as has not been properly given in the past. The fire-pumping arrangements and the fire mains are of vital importance and are somewhat more specifically covered than before. The bilge-pumping requirements have never been safeguarded by any proper legislation; it was necessary to make such provision as would insure that the convention requirements, at least, would be met. As drawn, the requirements, in some instances, are more stringent than those of the convention.

A provision of the convention which is essential and which must be applied to all vessels is that respecting the installation of an emergency source of power above the bulkhead deck. This is necessary so that if the engine rooms are flooded there will be power and light available for all emergency purposes. The minimum requirements for this installation have been covered in the legislation.

There are many other types of auxiliary machinery which should be given careful supervision, such as steering machinery, elevators, anchor windlasses, winches, refrigerating machinery, and watertight door machinery. All of these have been covered in order that the safety of the ship might be insured.

LIFESAVING APPLIANCES

The requirements for lifesaving appliances in the proposed legislation follow the convention so far as ocean-going vessels are concerned. The same requirements are demanded of vessels in other services to as great an extent as has been found practicable. The use of lifeboats with collapsible sides, although permitted by the convention, is not permitted on new vessels. An effort has been made to insure that, on new vessels, adequate provision is made for the stowage and handling of the lifesaving appliances.

OTHER EQUIPMENT

The legislation contains a number of requirements which have not heretofore been specifically laid down. These relate to proper signaling apparatus, compasses, interior communication, etc.

STATION BILLS AND DRILLS

In order to cover the requirements of the convention regarding the stationing of the crew and the duties of the owners in connection with the stationing and drilling of the crew, a complete outline of duties has been included in the legislation. The legislation indicates the duties of the owners, how the station bills are to be prepared and posted, how the training drills are to be held, and how the inspections are to be conducted by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation. It demands that drills be held before departure, in order that the inspectors may be satisfied the ship is in proper condition and the crew properly stationed and trained.

SAFETY CERTIFICATES

The convention requires "safety certificates", "safety radiotelegraphy certificates", or "exemption certificates" be issued to all ships engaged on international voyages. There appears to be no reason why these requirements should not be applied to domestic vessels as well, and, therefore, the proposed legislation contains an outline of the requirements as to these certificates.

ORGANIZATION OF THE BUREAU

A personnel advisory committee was formed to study and advise on all those subjects involving personnel which were required to be investigated by Senate Resolution 7 and that portion of its recommendations pertaining to "the adequacy and efficiency of the Steamboat Inspection Service", proposes a reorganization of the Bureau (now named the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation) so that it will be able to administer its duties in an efficient manner.

Under the existing laws the board of supervising inspectors is vested with authority to make rules and regulations and perform many other duties. While this may have been justified at the time the law was enacted, it can no longer be considered satisfactory. The duties of the supervising inspectors and their daily experience does not fit them for the decisions they are require to make. The responsibility for all rules and decisions should be vested in the Bureau, and the Bureau should have authority to call in such outside assistance as is best qualified to assist in preparing new and in revising old rules and regulations.

It is evident that the technical requirements of the proposed legislation cannot be of any use, if adopted, unless they are administered by an adequate and technically qualified force under the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and therefore the proposed reorganization of this Bureau is included with the legislation covering technical matters in order that the Bureau may be prepared to properly administer the law.

ACCOMMODATION FOR OFFICERS AND CREW

The personnel advisory committee, in addition to other matters, recommended certain specific requirements for crew's quarters. These have not been specifically covered heretofore in the law, but have been covered only by general legislation. Considerable complaint and dissatisfaction has resulted from the great variety of accommodations provided for the crews on the various types of vessels, some being very good and some being very poor. An effort has been made, therefore, to include in this legislation specific requirements which will provide reasonable and comfortable accommodations for all hands.

GRAIN CARGOES

In the past it is probable that more grain has been loaded in our ports than in the ports of any other country in the world, but we have never had any law governing the loading of grain cargoes. As is well known to the seafaring profession, grain in bulk makes a very dangerous cargo and most of the maritime nations have strict laws and regulations governing the loading and stowage of bulk cargoes composed of seeds or grain. Heretofore, ships loading in the United States have had to comply with the underwriters' rules if the underwriters' rules were acceptable to the nation to which the cargo was destined, or had to comply with the laws of the country to which the ship was bound. Due to the fact that we have no laws, no rules, and no inspection with respect to grain and seed cargoes, vessels load bulk cargoes of this sort in foreign ports and bring them to the United States in a condition which is dangerous and which causes unnecessary operations by the Coast Guard. If these same ships loaded the same cargo for a British port, they would not dare to load them in the same manner and, in consequence, it is necessary for us to have adequate rules in this respect, although the technical committee has not fully studied this matter.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, your committee recommends enactment of the following legislation, which is based on the rules prepared by the Technical Committee, attached hereto, and the recommendations of the Personnel Advisory Committee. We believe that such a law will promote greatly the safety of the ships themselves, and, in the last analysis, there can be no doubt that a ship in which the hazards of fire and collision have been reduced to the minimum gives the passenger far better protection than any devices which can be put aboard a vulnerable ship. At the same time the legislation provides for an organization capable of administering the technical requirements. A title is also included to control the loading of grain cargoes.

"A bill to amend existing laws so as to promote safety at sea by requiring the proper design, construction, maintenance, inspection, and operation of ships; to give effect to the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929; and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

"TITLE I. PURPOSE

"SECTION 1. The purpose of this act is to ensure that all merchant vessels documented under the laws of the United States are so designed, constructed, equipped, maintained, operated, and inspected as to ensure the maximum of safety to life and property.

"TITLE II. BUREAU OF MARINE INSPECTION AND NAVIGATION

"DUTIES

"SEC. 201. The Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall be responsible, under the Secretary of Commerce, for the general supervision of all matters relating to merchant ships and merchant seamen and shall execute the provisions of this act and all other acts relating to merchant shipping and merchant seamen except where specifically provided to the contrary in those acts.

"TITLE III. DEFINITIONS (GENERAL)

"SEC. 301. As used in this act:

"(a) 'Ship' or 'vessel' includes every description of water craft or other artificial contrivance, except aircraft, used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water, whether or not it is actually afloat.

"(b) A ship or vessel shall be considered a 'passenger ship' if it carries or is authorized to carry more than 12 passengers.

"(c) A 'passenger' is any person carried on board a ship or vessel, except (1) the officers and crew actually employed to man and operate the ship, (2) persons employed to carry on the business of the ship, and (3) persons on board a ship when they are carried, either because of the obligation laid upon the master to carry shipwrecked, distressed, or other persons in like or similar situations or by reason of any circumstance over which neither the master, the owner, nor the charterer (if any) has control.

"(d) A 'cargo ship' or 'cargo vessel' means any ship or vessel not a passenger ship or vessel.

"(e) A 'new ship' or 'new vessel' is one which is laid down or the plans of which are approved after the approval of this act.

"(f) The word 'approved' when used alone, means approved by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation.

"(g) The word 'Bureau', when used alone, means the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation.

"(h) The word 'inspector', when used alone, means a duly authorized inspector of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation.

"TITLE IV. GROUPING

"SEC. 401. All vessels documented under the laws of the United States shall be grouped in accordance with the service for which they are intended, as follows:

"(a) Group 1. Ocean-going vessels of 100 gross tons or over navigating more than 20 miles offshore.

"(b) Group 2. Great Lakes vessels of 100 gross tons or over; ocean-going vessels of 100 gross tons or over navigating less than 20 miles offshore.

"(c) Group 3. Ocean-going or Great Lakes vessels of 100 gross tons or over navigating partially protected waters.

"(d) Group 4. Vessels of 50 gross tons or over navigating bays, sounds, and protected waters.

"(e) Group 5. Vessels of 50 gross tons or over navigating rivers, harbors, and small lakes.

"(f) The requirements of this act shall apply to all vessels included in these groups.

"SEC. 402. Each of the groups set forth in section 401 of this act may be divided by the Bureau into subgroups in accordance with the type of ship, such as 'passenger vessel', 'passenger vessel carrying unberthed passengers', 'passenger ferry', 'passenger vessel used for amusement or recreation (whether mobile or immobile)', 'yacht', 'cargo vessel', 'tanker', 'dredge', 'fisherman', 'wrecking vessel', 'towing vessel', 'cargo barge', 'tank barge', 'sailing vessel', and such others as may be required.

"TITLE V. APPLICATION

"SEC. 501. The requirements of this act shall apply to any new vessel of the United States falling in groups 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

"SEC. 502. (a) In the case of existing vessels which do not already comply with the provisions of this act, the arrangements on each vessel shall be considered by the Bureau with a view to bringing such vessel as nearly into compliance with the requirements for new vessels as is practicable and reasonable, but as a minimum they shall meet the following safety requirements.

"(b) All existing passenger vessels in groups 1 and 2 shall, within 1 year after the date of the approval of this act, complete improvements to provide a standard of subdivision at least equal to the requirements for new ships of the Convention for Promoting Safety at Sea, 1929, and to provide stability in the intact and damaged conditions in accordance with the requirements for new vessels as set forth in this act wherever these improvements are practicable.

"(c) All existing passenger ships shall, within 1 year after the date of the approval of this act, complete improvements to provide protection against fire as required by section 744 of this act.

"SEC. 503. The provisions of this act shall not apply to:

"(a) A ship of war.

"(b) A ship of the United States belonging to and operated by the Government, except a ship of the United States Maritime Commission, Inland Coastwise Waterways Service, or the Panama Railroad.

"TITLE VI. RULES AND INSPECTIONS

"PART 1. RULES

"SEC. 601. (a) The Board of Supervising Inspectors, established by Revised Statutes 4405, as amended, is hereby abolished and all authority, powers, and duties of such Board shall be transferred to the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation.

"(b) The Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall, for the administration and enforcement of this act, promulgate, after approval by the Secretary of Commerce, detailed rules and regulations covering the design, construction, maintenance, and inspection of all vessels. These detailed rules and regulations shall be kept up to date and shall be completely revised at least once every 5 years. The Bureau shall convene, whenever necessary, a technical committee composed of technical representatives from the United States Maritime Commission, the Navy Department, the Coast Guard, such other Government agencies as may be helpful, together with such naval architects and marine engineers from other than Government sources, for the purpose of advising the Bureau on the preparation of adequate rules. The necessary expenses of this technical committee are hereby authorized to be appropriated and shall be covered as an item in the Bureau's request for funds for the year concerned. These rules and regulations, when approved by the Secretary of Commerce and promulgated by the Bureau, shall have the effect of law, and shall be sufficiently inclusive to make effective the requirements of this act and insure that each ship is, from the point of view of safety, fit for the service for which it is intended: Provided, That each year, at the beginning of the session, the Bureau, through the Secretary of Commerce, shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives whether, if any new legislation is necessary, the Bureau shall submit definite recommendations for it to Congress through the Secretary of Commerce.

"(c) In each case where it is provided, in this act or in the Bureau's rules and regulations promulgated in pursuance of the requirements of this act, that plans or plans and specifications be submitted to the Bureau for approval, the Bureau shall act upon them with as little delay as possible. When the Bureau approves the proposed design it shall endorse the plans and specifications to that effect and return one set to the owner (or his accredited representative (and send another to the Bureau's inspector having cognizance of the work, and retain one set for the Bureau's records. After the approval of the plans or the plans and specifications, no changes in design or material shall be made without first obtaining the Bureau's approval of the changes. Appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing shall be granted by the Bureau to all interested parties before any such plans or plans and specifications are disapproved.

"PART 2. INSPECTIONS

"SEC. 602. Every new or existing ship shall be subject to inspection to determine her material condition, as follows:

"(1) An inspection shall be made before the ship is placed in service.

"(2) A periodical inspection shall be made at least once every year.

"(3) Additional inspections shall be made whenever necessary.

"SEC. 603. The inspections required by section 602 shall be carried out in general as follows:

"(a) The inspection before the ship is put in service shall include a complete inspection of the hull, machinery, and equipment, including the outside of the ship's bottom and the inside and outside of the boilers (when installed). This inspection shall be such as to insure that the arrangements, material, and scantlings of the hull, boilers, and their appurtenances, main and auxiliary machinery, steering gear, lifesaving appliances, and other equipment fully comply with the requirements of this act and of the detailed rules and regulations promulgated as a result thereof. This inspection shall also be such as to insure that the workmanship of all parts of the ship, its machinery, and its equipment are in all respects satisfactory.

"(b) The periodical inspecion shall include an inspection of the whole of the hull, boilers, machinery, and equipment, including the outside of the ship's bottom. The inspection shall be such as to ensure that the ship, as regards the hull, boilers, their appurtenances, main and auxiliary machinery, steering gear, lifesaving appliances, and other equipment, is in satisfactory condition and fit for the service for which it is intended, and that it complies with the requirements of this act and of the detailed rules and regulations promulgated as a result thereof: Provided, That the inspection of 'the outside of the ship's bottom' shall not be required annually on vessels in groups 2, 3, and 5, which remain at all times in fresh water.

"(c) An inspection, either general or partial, according to the circumstances, shall be made every time an accident occurs or a defect is discovered which affects the safety of the ship or the efficiency or completeness of its lifesaving appliances, machinery or other equipment, or whenever any other important repairs or renewals are made. The inspections shall be such as to ensure that the necessary repairs or renewals have been effectively made, that the material and workmanship of such repairs or renewals are in all respects satisfactory, and that the ship complies in all respects with the provisions of this act and of the detailed rules and regulations promulgated as a result thereof.

"(d) An inspection, before sailing, of each passenger vessel in groups 1 and 2, to determine that the lifesaving and fire-fighting equipment is in satisfactory condition and that the watertight integrity and stability of the vessel are being properly maintained.

"(e) An inspection shall be made to ensure that vessels do not leave port with a dangerous list or so down by the head or stern as to make them unmanageable in a heavy sea or in narrow waters.

"(f) After the inspection of a vessel, as provided in paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) of this section, has been completed, no change shall be made in the structural arrangements, machinery, equipment, or other parts covered by the inspections without the approval of the Bureau.

"(g) Vessels out of service in a lay-up condition shall not be subject to the normal periodic inspections.

"(h) Vessels built abroad, which may be entered for documentation under the laws of the United States, shall be subjected to the inspection required by paragraph (a) above upon their first arrival in a port of the United States.

"TITLE VII. HULL

"PART 1. STRUCTURAL STRENGTH

"SEC. 701. (a) In order that the Bureau may be satisfied that the structural strength of a new passenger vessel will be satisfactory for the service for which it is intended, it shall require that the midship section and all other essential structural plans be submitted to it for approval. The determination of the strength of a ship shall be based, in principle, on the rules outlined in the International Load Line Convention proclaimed by the President of the United States, January 5, 1933. In the case of a new passenger vessel in group 4 or 5, consideration shall be given to the nature of the service in determining the scantlings. In each case the scantlings and arrangements proposed must be adequate for the service. The construction and attachment of the rudder shall be of such design as to insure the maximum protection against loss or derangement. When the proposed vessel is to be classed by the American Bureau of Shipping, the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation may accept this classification as indicating adequate structural strength. The Bureau shall assure itself that the ship, as constructed, complies in all essential respects with the approved plans.

"(b) When a cargo vessel is converted to a passenger vessel, the procedure outlined in paragraph (a) shall also be followed.

"PART 2. WATERTIGHT INTEGRITY

"Subdivision

"SEC. 711. (a) Each passenger vessel shall be as efficiently subdivided as possible, having regard to the maximum number of passengers to be carried with due weight given to the nature of the service for which it is intended. In order that the Bureau may be satisfied that this is the case it shall require the necessary subdivision plans and flooding curves of the ship, as finally laid down, be submitted to it for approval. Each such ship must be subdivided and must have sufficient stability when damaged as provided by this act.

"(b) In the case of any passenger vessel having a continuous bulkhead deck, the main transverse bulkhead for subdividing the vessel or the equivalent thereof, shall be carried watertight up to the bulkhead deck. In the case of any passenger vessel not having a continuous bulkhead deck, a continuous bulkhead deck line shall be assumed which will give the same effect as would a continuous bulkhead deck, and the sides of the vessel and the bulkheads concerned shall be carried watertight up to this line. In either case, the subdivision load line shall be so located that, under the conditions of flooding which the vessel is required to sustain, no part of the bulkhead deck in the first instance or of the assumed bulkhead deck line in the second instance shall be immersed. Where an assumed continuous bulkhead deck line is used, there shall in all cases be a working platform or deck above this line to give access fore and aft.

"(c) Each such vessel, as constructed, must comply in all essential respects with the approved subdivision plans.

"(d) When a cargo vessel is converted to a passenger vessel, the procedure outlined in paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) shall also be followed.

"(e) A cargo vessel, designed for a special purpose which does not permit normal subdivision, or a cargo vessel designed to carry dangerous cargo, shall not be permitted to carry any passengers.

"SEC. 712. (a) The degrees of subdivision provided for in passenger vessels shall vary with the maximum number of passengers the vessel is authorized to carry, the length of the vessel and with the service, in such manner that the highest degree of subdivision corresponds with the vessels of greatest length carrying the greatest number of passengers.

"(b) No new passenger vessel shall be built unless, as a minimum requirement, it is so subdivided by bulkheads as to permit any single watertight compartment in the ship to be flooded without the vessel sinking and without her changing trim or listing to such an extent as to become unsafe or prevent launching its lifeboats. When the Bureau finds, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, that the size of the vessel permits or the number of passengers to be carried makes it necessary, no new passenger vessel shall be built unless it is so subdivided by bulkheads as to permit any two adjacent watertight compartments in the ship to be simultaneously flooded without the vessel sinking and without its changing trim or listing to such an extent as to become unsafe or prevent launching its lifeboats. When the Bureau finds, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, that the size of the ship permits or the number of passengers to be carried makes it necessary, no new passenger vessel shall be built unless it is so subdivided by bulkheads as to permit any three adjacent watertight compartments in the ship to be simultaneously flooded without the vessel sinking and without its changing trim or listing to such an extent as to become unsafe or prevent launching its lifeboats. In any case where the Bureau finds, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearings, that a safer subdivision is reasonable and practicable, such subdivision shall be required. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall indicate the method the Bureau will follow in determining the degree of subdivision required for each vessel.

"(c) The requirements outlined in paragraphs (a) and (b) shall apply with equal force to cargo vessels which may be converted into passenger vessels.

"SEC. 713. (a) All vessels shall be fitted with watertight forward and after peak bulkheads and with watertight bulkheads at the extremities of the machinery space, and, in screw vessels, with watertight shaft tunnels or equivalent subdivision. The bulkheads here named shall be located as required by the rules and regulations of the Bureau and shall be run up to the bulkhead deck or to such a height as to prevent water flowing over them in case any compartment they protect is flooded.

"(b) All new passenger vessels shall be fitted with inner bottoms which will give adequate protection in case of grounding. The inner bottom shall extend from side to side of the vessel and be joined to the side plating in such a manner as to give ample protection at the turn of the bilge and shall extend from the fore peak bulkhead to the after peak bulkhead whenever this is practicable. The double bottoms shall be tested under a head of water at least up to the bulkhead deck.

"SEC. 714. When the Bureau finds, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, that a new passenger vessel is designed to ply on voyages where exceptional risks are encountered due to weather or traffic conditions, or where the small proportion of space allotted to cargo makes it possible, such vessel shall be subdivided to such greater extent than that called for in this act as may be practicable and reasonable in the interests of safety. The Bureau may, in the case of individual new passenger vessels in groups 4 and 5, when it finds that the route and the conditions of the voyage are such as to render full compliance with sections 712 and 713 (b) unreasonable or unnecessary, grant such exemptions as may be required to meet the special conditions.

"Subdivision load lines

"SEC. 715. In order that the required degree of subdivision shall be maintained in passenger vessels, a load line corresponding to the approved subdivision draft shall be assigned and marked on the ship's sides, and shall be known as the subdivision load line. A vessel having spaces which are especially adapted for the accommodation of passengers and the carriage of cargo alternatively may, if the owners desire, have one or more additional load lines assigned and marked to correspond with the subdivision drafts, which the Bureau may approve for the alternative service conditions. The free-board, corresponding to each approved subdivision load line, and the conditions for service for which it is approved, shall be clearly indicated on the safety certificate. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall clearly provide for the manner in which the subdivision load lines shall be located, marked, and recorded, but for vessels in groups 1 and 2, in no case shall the position of the subdivision load line be such as to permit a deeper draft than would the load line as determined by the strength of the vessel based on the rules of the International Load Line Convention proclaimed by the President of the United States, January 5, 1933.

"Stability

"SEC. 716. (a) Every passenger vessel and every vessel converted into a passenger vessel shall be inclined and, before the vessel is certified it shall be established that it will have adequate stability, in the usual service conditions, to comply with the requirements of sections 711 (b) and 712 regarding stability when damaged.

"(b) The owner shall supply the operating personnel with such information as is necessary for their guidance in loading and ballasting the vessel in order that adequate stability may be maintained in service, and this information shall be in such form as to be clearly understood by the vessel's personnel.

"Openings in bulkheads and ship's sides—drills

"SEC. 717. (a) The openings in the watertight bulkheads of passenger vessels shall be kept to the minimum necessary to the proper working of the vessel and every practicable provision shall be made to prevent water from finding its way from one compartment to another. Hinged watertight doors may be permitted in the transverse bulkheads bounding cargo spaces in accordance with regulation IX (7) (b) of the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929, but such doors shall be closed and made watertight before the ship leaves port. Hinged watertight doors in passenger, crew, and working spaces may be permitted in accordance with regulation IX (7) (a) of the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929. All other watertight doors shall be sliding doors and shall be power operated except where those in the machinery spaces (which are always under supervision) are the only ones installed other than those in the cargo between-deck spaces.

"(b) The openings in the ship's sides, below the bulkhead deck, shall be kept to the minimum necessary for the proper operation of the ship or the comfort of the passengers or crew, and those openings shall be so installed and fitted that they can be closed and made watertight so as to prevent water finding its way into the ship. All side doors below the bulkhead deck shall be closed and made watertight before the ship leaves port. All air ports (side scuttles) shall be in accordance with the requirements of the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929, except that the air ports (side scuttles) which are required by regulation X (d) to be 'locked before the ship leaves port' shall be of the nonopening type.

"(c) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall, for safety purposes, set forth what other watertight doors, portable plates, air ports, gangways, cargo and coaling ports, and other openings shall be required to be kept closed during navigation, and shall require them to be closed before the ship leaves port. Likewise the Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth what openings through the ship's sides of like character may be opened at sea on consent of the master. The time of closing and the time of opening such openings shall be recorded in the official log book.

"(d) Drills for the operating of watertight doors, air ports, valves, the closing mechanism of scuppers, ash chutes, and rubbish chutes shall take place weekly. In ships in which the voyage exceeds 1 week in duration a complete drill shall be held before leaving port, and others thereafter at least once a week during the voyage: Provided, That all watertight doors in the main transverse bulkheads in use at sea shall be operated daily. The watertight doors and all mechanisms and indicators connected therewith and all valves, the closing of which is necessary to make a compartment watertight, shall be periodically operated at sea at least once each week. A record of all drills and inspections required by this section shall be entered in the official log book with an explicit record of any defects which may be disclosed and steps taken to remedy them.

"(e) At each inspection made by the Bureau's inspectors special precautions shall be taken to determine that the watertight integrity of the ship is being maintained, that there are no unauthorized openings in the structure, and the means provided for closing all authorized openings are in satisfactory condition.

"Construction, tests, escapes

"SEC. 718. The rules and regulations of the Bureau shall provide in detail, in accordance with the provisions of this act, for—

"(a) The construction and testing of subdivision bulkheads, inner bottoms, watertight decks, trunks, ventilators, tunnels, and similar structures.

"(b) The requirements governing openings in bulkheads, in the ship's sides, and in the weather deck and the character and use of means which shall be provided for closing these openings.

"(c) The tests and the periodical inspection and operation of the means of closing openings in bulkheads and in the ship's sides.

"(d) Exits from watertight compartments without passing through watertight doors.

"PART 3. FIRE PREVENTION

"SEC. 721. (a) The requirements of this part shall apply, unless otherwise limited, to all vessels of 100 gross tons or more, and the general arrangement plans (and such detail plans as may be necessary), showing all the fireproof construction proposed to comply with this act, shall be submitted to the Bureau for approval. In each case the Bureau must be satisfied that the vessel will be fully as fireproof as required by this part before approving such plans.

"(b) In the case of vessels of less than 100 gross tons the requirements of this part shall be used as a guide and shall be applied as nearly as is practicable and reasonable in each case.

"Definitions

"SEC. 722. As used in this part—

"(a) 'Accommodations' means all enclosed spaces used by the passengers and crew, including public spaces.

"(b) 'Public spaces' means such spaces as halls, dining rooms, lounges, glass-screened deck lounges, winter gardens, cafes, and other recreational spaces normally accessible during the voyage.

"(c) 'Main vertical zones' means those sections into which the hull and superstructure is divided by the main fire-screen bulkheads.

"(d) 'Control stations' means those spaces in which a 24-hour watch is maintained and where (1) navigating equipment is located, (2) radio equipment is located, and (3) fire-recording instruments are located.

"Fireproof construction—New vessels

"SEC. 723. Each new passenger vessel to which this part applies shall be divided vertically into main fire zones by flametight steel bulkheads, extending from deck to deck and to the shell, which are so insulated and stiffened as to remain intact and prevent the spread of fire on the unexposed side in case of a conflagration. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall prescribe the tests necessary to determine the suitability of both the construction and the insulation of these main vertical zone bulkheads. The main vertical zone bulkheads shall not be more than 131 feet apart and shall be vertically continuous with the main transverse subdivision bulkheads. Where steps are necessary in the main vertical zone bulkheads, the decks shall be made equal to the main vertical zone bulkheads in fire-resisting qualities. Boundaries of the same construction as the main vertical zone bulkheads shall be used for:

"(a) The boundaries of public spaces, the deck area of which is in excess of 15,000 square feet.

"(b) The boundaries of a public space extending through one or more decks, the deck area of which is in excess of 10,000 square feet.

"(c) The boundaries of stairway and elevator enclosures.

"(d) The boundaries of control stations.

"(e) The boundaries of accommodations adjacent to such spaces as storerooms, galleys, pantries, cargo spaces, and machinery spaces.

"(f) The boundaries of cargo, elevator, and machinery trunks extending through accommodations.

"SEC. 724. Steel bulkheads, either lined or unlined, which are so constructed and stiffened as to remain intact in case of a conflagration, shall be used for the boundaries of the following spaces, and the Bureau's rules and regulations shall prescribe tests for determining the suitability of the construction:

"(a) The boundaries of those parts of the main vertical zones which do not lie within the accommodations.

"(b) The subdivision of such spaces as storerooms, galleys, pantries, cargo and machinery spaces within the same group, so long as the requirements of section 723 (e) are met.

"(c) The boundaries of such spaces as storerooms, galleys, pantries, cargo, and machinery spaces adjoining spaces in which there is no combustible material or furnishing, such as stairways, corridors, lavatories, and ventilation trunks.

"(d) The boundaries of vertical trunks other than cargo, machinery, and elevator trunks.

"(e) Cofferdams between oil tanks and cargo spaces.

"(f) The vertical boundaries of deck houses.

"SEC. 725. Within the main vertical zones, where the steel bulkheads covered by section 724 are not required, the bulkheads in staterooms and similar enclosures shall be of panel construction of incombustible material which will remain intact in case of a conflagration, and the Bureau's rules and regulations shall prescribe tests for determining the insulating quality and suitability of the material and construction used. The panels shall be assembled with incombustible supporting members throughout so as to be flametight, and shall be made intact from deck to deck and to the shell, either by fitting the panels to the decks and to the shell or by the use of suitable draft stops of metal or other incombustible material; except that, in passenger spaces, within a deck area not exceeding 1,200 square feet or with a maximum of 66 feet between transverse incombustible bulkheads, which are made intact from deck to deck and to the shell, the incombustible bulkheads forming the enclosures within this area need not be made intact from deck to deck, provided that ceilings of incombustible material are fitted and made intact with the boundary side walls of each individual stateroom or space. Corridor bulkheads, in all cases, shall be made intact between decks.

"Stairways

"SEC. 726. There shall be fitted at least one stairway of ample proportions, in each vertical fire zone, which shall be in itself completely enclosed by bulkheads of the same construction as the main vertical zone bulkheads, and the doors of which shall be kept well clear of passing traffic. These stairways shall be considered safety zones so arranged as to serve as fire escapes from all spaces below decks to the boat deck or embarkation deck, and no combustible material shall be used in their construction, decoration, or furnishing. They shall be directly accessible from the main fore-and-aft corridors. Open stairways may be permitted only when they lie wholly within a public space which is served, for escape purposes, by an enclosed stairway or a direct escape to the open deck.

"Corridors

"SEC. 727. Corridors shall be treated as safety zones and shall contain no combustible material of any kind. The bulkheads of all corridors shall be of incombustible material throughout and, without exception, shall be made intact from deck to deck.

"Doors

"SEC. 728. (a) The doors provided for closing the openings in the bulkheads covered by sections 723 and 724, shall be of such materials and construction as will insure them being equal in fire resisting qualities with the bulkheads in which they are fitted, and those in the main vertical zone bulkheads shall be installed so as to insure the openings in the bulkheads being flametight when the fire doors are closed. They shall comply with the following special requirements:

"(b) The fire doors in the main vertical zone bulkheads shall be of the hinged self-closing type, capable of being opened and closed at the door, by one person, and equipped with a locking device capable of holding them securely closed. These doors shall be held in the open position by an electrical device which can be released from a control station so as to permit the doors to close. This electrical device shall also be so connected that an indication of fire by the manual fire-alarm system will result in all the doors being released and permitted to close automatically. No glass shall be used in these doors.

"(c) Doors in stairway enclosures shall be the same as the main-fire-zone bulkhead doors except that—

"(1) They shall open outward in the direction of escape;

"(2) They shall be fitted with locking devices which can be operated by passengers;

"(3) They shall be fitted with no more than 100 square inches of wire-inserted glass of a thickness to be prescribed by the Bureau's rules and regulations.

"(d) Doors in steel bulkheads, when not required to be watertight doors, shall be made of steel with locking devices suitable to the service. The Bureau may permit doors of other materials when the nature and location of the space permits.

"(e) Doors in bulkheads constructed of incombustible panels may be of hollow metal, metal frame with wire inserted glass, wood with metal veneer, wood with hard asbestos veneer, or wood with a layer of asbestos between the outer veneer and the core, but doors which lead into corridors shall be so constructed that there is no combustible material exposed on the corridor side. Vent grills may be permitted in all of these doors (in the lower half) and such doors shall be fitted with locking devices suitable to the service. Wherever practicable doors in passenger staterooms shall open outward.

"Decks

"SEC. 729. (a) In addition to any other requirements for steel decks, for the purpose of assuring strength or watertight integrity, each new passenger vessel shall be divided horizontally by complete steel decks, made intact with the shell or other boundaries and with all steel bulkheads.

"(b) All openings in these decks shall be closed, except as provided in section 723 (b) with appropriate incombustible and flametight bulkheads and doors.

"(c) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth the types of deck coverings and deck insulations which are found to be acceptable for the various spaces. Decks over machinery spaces, boiler and other spaces where high temperatures occur; and decks dividing accommodations from cargo spaces, and such spaces as storerooms, galleys, and pantries, shall be at least as well insulated as the main vertical zone bulkheads except, where there is no combustible furniture or other combustible material which is in contact with the deck in these accommodations, the insulation may be made not less than two-thirds as effective as the insulation of the main vertical bulkheads.

"(d) All refrigerator spaces shall be properly insulated and shall be made fireproof so far as practicable.

"(e) Calked wood decks may be fitted on steel weather decks which are outside of deck houses or other enclosures.

"(f) Steel decks may be unsheathed within and over general cargo spaces except where these decks are over or under accommodations.

"Ceilings

"SEC. 730. (a) Where ceilings are installed they shall be of incombustible material. Where the stateroom boundary bulkheads of a space are made intact from deck to deck, the ceilings, if used, may be of lighter construction than the bulkheads but of incombustible materials. Where ceilings are installed in groups of staterooms and similar enclosures, in which it is permitted under section 725 to have bulkheads not intact with the deck over areas not exceeding 1,200 square feet, the ceilings are to be made of incombustible material and made in fact with the boundary side walls of each individual stateroom or space.

(b) Ceilings in public spaces requiring bulkheads equal to the main vertical zone bulkheads shall be equal to the bulkhead construction permitted for staterooms where accommodation space is above them and may be of lighter incombustible material where only an open deck is above.

"Linings, furring, beam-boxing

"SEC. 731. (a) Linings in deck houses and against the vessel's side shall be of incombustible material.

"(b) Furring and beam-boxing shall be of metal or other satisfactory incombustible material. In no case shall beam-boxing be carried through a bulkhead.

"Draft stops

"SEC. 732. (a) Efficient draft stops constructed of metal or other incombustible material shall be fitted wherever the lining is framed away from the shell or bulkhead. The deck area of the spaces separated by draft stops shall be kept to a minimum, and in no case shall the spacing of the draft stops exceed one-half the allowed distance between main vertical zone bulkheads.

"(b) Where ceilings of public spaces are framed away from the underside of the beams, draft stops shall be fitted and so spaced that the superficial area of the space is limited both fore and aft and athwartships, and in no case shall be spacing of the draft stops be greater than one-half the allowed distance between the main vertical zone bulkheads.

"(c) Where groups of staterooms are installed, in accordance with section 725, so that the bulkheads at the extremities of these areas furnish draft stops, the draft stops between the lining and the ship's side or bulkhead shall be continuous with the draft stops above the ceiling, and in all other cases the ceiling draft stops and the draft stops behind bulkheads or linings shall be adjacent to and continuous with each other.

"Elevators and dumb-waiters

"SEC. 733. (a) Where elevators are fitted in, or pass through, passenger accommodations, they shall be enclosed by bulkheads equal to the main vertical zone bulkheads and shall be fitted with solid elevator cages and solid doors constructed of incombustible material. Where an elevator enclosure is entirely located within a stairway enclosure, it may be of unlined steel construction, but it then shall have no exit outside of the stairway enclosure.

"(b) Where dumb-waiters are fitted in passenger spaces for such purposes as the transportation of supplies from storerooms to galleys and pantries or from galleys to pantries or serving spaces, they shall be enclosed by boundaries equal to the main vertical zone bulkheads and fitted with doors of incombustible material.

"Windows

"SEC. 734. Windows shall be constructed with metal frames throughout and fitted with wire-inserted glass in panes in proportion to the thickness of the glass. The glass shall be retained by beading or other satisfactory means which will insure the whole structure of the window being fireproof.

"Furniture and furnishings

"SEC. 735 (a) On new passenger vessels all dressers, tables, lockers, shelvings, and other appurtenances in galleys, pantries, and storerooms shall be of incombustible material.

"(b) The furniture in the crew's quarters shall be of incombustible material. In the staterooms of the passengers and officers the wardrobes and beds shall be constructed of incombustible material.

"(c) In dining rooms the furniture shall be of metal or other incombustible material so far as may be practicable.

"(d) Furniture in all offices, shops, bureaus, and similar spaces shall be of metal or other incombustible material.

"(e) The furniture in public spaces, so far as is reasonable and practicable, shall be of metal or other fire-resistant material.

"Special rules

"SEC. 736. (a) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall prescribe the combinations of bulkheads covered by sections 724 and 725 which will be accepted as equivalent to a bulkhead as required by section 723, and shall also give the conditions under which these substitutions may be made in order to get equal protection. The Bureau shall also prescribe what metal or other incombustible material may be substituted safely for the panel construction required by section 725, when the furniture in the enclosure is all of incombustible material.

"(b) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall provide for the use of fireproof insulation for the refrigerator spaces on board ship as soon as the Bureau is satisfied that satisfactory material is available and its use justified.

"Dangerous cargoes

"SEC. 737. The Bureau shall be especially vigilant to see that dangerous, inflammable, or explosive materials are not carried on passenger vessels except when packed, marked, and stowed in accordance with law. Whenever the Bureau finds existing laws are inadequate, the Bureau shall promptly originate recommendations to Congress, through the Secretary of Commerce, for the necessary changes.

"Ventilation

"SEC. 738. All accommodations shall be sufficiently and efficiently ventilated so as to insure the health and comfort of the passengers and crew.

"Mechanical ventilation

"SEC. 739. (a) Where mechanical ventilation is installed, on a new passenger vessel, the blowers shall be located, so far as possible, so that the ducts leading to or from the various enclosures can be so installed that they do not pass through any main fire-zone bulkhead. Where the necessity clearly exists, the Bureau may permit ducts to pass through a main fire-zone bulkhead, near the top, in order to reach the blower, but in this case there shall be fitted in the duct, where it passes through the bulkhead, an automatic damper which will completely close it; and the duct beyond the zone which it serves shall be insulated with insulation equivalent to the bulkhead through which it passes. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the details of these requirements.

"(b) Arrangements shall be provided so that the inlets of supply blowers and the outlets of exhaust blowers may be quickly covered in case of fire.

"Automatic blower control

"SEC. 740. (a) All blowers supplying air to or exhausting air from spaces, other than the machinery spaces, shall be provided with a master control which will automatically stop them when a fire is indicated by the manual fire-alarm system. Arrangements shall also be made so that the master control can be operated manually from two widely separated points. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the details of these requirements.

"(b) Each blower shall be so arranged that it can be started manually so that those not having to do with the affected zone may be utilized.

"Natural ventilation

"SEC. 741. In cases where natural ventilation is used, both automatic and manually operated means for closing ventilators shall be provided so that fire cannot be communicated, through the ventilator, from one compartment to another, and so that ventilators, passing through accommodations unaffected by the fire, will not become heated and endanger the unaffected space.

"SEC. 742. When a cargo vessel is converted into a passenger vessel the requirements of sections 721 to 741, inclusive, shall apply with the same force as to new passenger vessels.

"Date for full compliance

"SEC. 743. All new passenger vessels, the plans of which are approved on or after January 1, 1940, shall comply fully with the fireproof requirements of this part. Prior to January 1, 1940, the Bureau may permit new passenger vessels to be laid down which do not fully comply with the full fireproofing requirements of this act provided the following conditions are met:

"(a) In addition to the main fire zone bulkheads required by section 723 of this act, there shall also be required, where the distance between these main fire-zone bulkheads exceeds 66 feet, a steel bulkhead as required by section 724 of this act which shall be fitted completely across the vessel or deck house in such a manner that the distance between it and any adjacent main fire-screen bulkhead does not exceed 66 feet. This additional bulkhead shall be lined on both sides with incombustible material so that no combustible material shall come in contact with the steel.

"(b) The main corridor bulkheads and the arrangement of corridors and passageways shall be in accordance with section 727 of this act. All doors, other than fire doors, leading into the main corridors shall comply with the requirements of section 728 (e) of this act. Branch corridors shall be fitted with doors where they join the main corridors.

"(c) No space enclosed by the fire screen bulkheads and the incombustible corridor bulkheads shall exceed 3,000 square feet in deck area for stateroom spaces and 6,000 square feet in deck area for public spaces. Within spaces thus enclosed bulkheads, ceilings, and doors may be of the usual wood construction, in lieu of the construction required by section 725 of this act, but in this case the spaces must be protected by automatic sprinklers throughout and fitted with the fire-detection devices required by section 756 (a) of this act.

"(d) So far as practicable, no power or lighting mains, communication systems, steering gear control or other system necessary to the proper operation of the vessel shall be installed so as to pass through those portions of the structure where combustible material is permitted. If it is necessary for them to pass through these spaces they shall be enclosed in a fireproof trunk.

"(e) In all other respects the construction of such vessels shall comply with the requirements of sections 723, 724, 726, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 739, 740, and 741.

"FIREPROOF CONSTRUCTION—EXISTING VESSELS

"SEC. 744. Existing passenger vessels, shall be brought as nearly into the conditions set forth for new vessels as is practicable in each case, but the degree of protection shall be at least equal to the following:

"(a) Existing passenger vessels in all groups which have steel fire-screen bulkheads, steel decks, and steel deck houses; or similar vessels which have wooden decks lined on the under side with incombustible material in accommodations or freight and machinery spaces, the following conditions shall pertain:

"(1) The hull and superstructure shall be divided into fire zones, not exceeding 131 feet in length, by fire-screen bulkheads, and efficient fire doors for closing the openings in these bulkheads shall be provided.

"(2) Unprotected openings or stairways (other than the continuous main stairway) through decks shall be arranged so as to prevent the communication of fire from one horizontal zone to another so far as is practicable.

"(3) The main stairways (forming escapes from all decks), shall be enclosed either in accordance with the requirements of section 724 or with the requirements of section 725 of this act. If it is impracticable to enclose the main stairways, draft doors shall be fitted at lobby or foyer entrances, port and starboard, forward and aft, to separate the foyer from the corridors. Bulkheads adjacent to foyers shall be fire-stopped. There shall be a steel enclosed emergency stairway in each fire zone from all decks to the embarkation or boat decks. Where, in any zone, there is a lateral escape to a weather deck, the enclosed escapes may be omitted.

"(4) Wherever the lining is framed away from the shell or a bulkhead, draft stops of metal or other incombustible material shall be installed so that the deck area of the spaces separated by the draft stops shall not be greater than 100 square feet, and in no case shall the spaces between draft stops exceed 30 feet. Where ceilings are framed away from the under side of beams, draft stops shall be fitted for all spaces so that the area enclosed does not exceed 600 square feet, or the distance between them exceed 15 feet in the fore and aft direction. The ceiling draft stops and the draft stops behind bulkheads or linings shall be adjacent to and continuous with each other. Where the width or height of such spaces is such as to make the use of sprinklers effective, sprinklers may be installed so as to give adequate protection and the spacing of the draft stops may be increased.

"(5) Ducts and mechanical ventilators which extend through a fire-screen bulkhead shall be fitted with fire dampers operated by fusible links. Arrangements shall also be provided for shutting down all intake and exhaust blowers at a central point. In addition, dampers shall be fitted in the engine room, fireroom, and cargo-hold ventilators to prevent smoke from interfering with the work of the crew.

"(6) The Bureau shall make rules and regulations covering the requirements for the insulation of hot spaces, the screening of airports and ventilators, and such similar requirements as may be necessary to guard against fire.

"(b) All other existing passenger vessels of all groups shall meet the following minimum requirements:

"(1) Wherever the lining is framed away from the shell or a bulkhead, draft stops of metal or other incombustible material shall be installed so that the deck area of the spaces separated by the draft stops shall not be greater than 100 square feet, and in no case shall the spaces between draft stops exceed 30 feet. Where ceilings are framed away from the under side of beams, draft stops shall be fitted for all spaces so that the area enclosed does not exceed 600 square feet, or the distance between them exceed 15 feet in the fore and aft direction. The ceiling draft stops and the draft stops behind bulkheads or linings shall be adjacent to and continuous with each other. Where the width or height of such spaces is such as to make the use of sprinklers effective, sprinklers may be installed so as to give adequate protection and the spacing of the draft stops may be increased.

"(2) Ducts and mechanical ventilators which extend through a fire-screen bulkhead shall be fitted with fire dampers operated by fusible links. Arrangements shall also be provided for shutting down all intake and exhaust blowers at a central point. In addition, dampers shall be fitted in the engine room, fireroom, and cargo-hold ventilators to prevent smoke from interfering with the work of the crew.

"(3) The Bureau shall make rules and regulations covering the requirements for the insulation of hot spaces, the screening of airports and ventilators, and such similar requirements as may be necessary to guard against fire.

"(4) They shall have the sprinkler protection as required by section 764 of this act.

"Cargo vessels

"SEC. 745. New cargo vessels shall meet the following minimum requirements:

"(a) The boundaries of machinery trunks extending through accommodations or service spaces to comply with section 723.

"(b) The main vertical zone bulkheads and the boundaries of the following spaces shall comply with section 724:

"(1) The subdivision of all service spaces, cargo, and machinery spaces.

"(2) The boundaries of such spaces as storerooms, galleys, cargo, and machinery spaces adjoining spaces in which there is no combustible material or furnishings such as stairways, corridors, lavatories, and ventilation trunks.

"(3) The boundaries of vertical trunks other than machinery trunks.

"(4) The vertical boundaries of deck houses.

"(c) The horizontal subdivisions of the main vertical zones shall be formed by complete steel decks made intact with the steel bulkheads and with the shell.

"(1) Steel decks separating accommodations from service spaces, cargo spaces, and machinery spaces shall be made in accordance with section 729 (c).

"(d) In other respects the requirements for passenger vessels shall be used as a guide and applied to cargo vessels wherever it is reasonable and practicable to do so. Where the passengers and crew of a cargo vessel have direct access to the open decks without the use of stairways or ladders, a lesser degree of fireproofing may be permitted.

"PART 4. FIRE DETECTION AND EXTINCTION

"SEC. 751. Each passenger vessel shall be so equipped with fire detection and fire extinction apparatus as to reduce the fire hazard to a minimum; and, should a fire occur, insure its prompt extinction. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover in detail the requirements set forth in this part and shall prescribe the necessary tests so that there is assurance that the fire detection and extinction apparatus is properly installed and kept in proper working condition.

"Definitions

"SEC. 752. As used in this part:

"(a) A 'detection and alarm zone' is that section of the vessel bounded by the main fire-screen bulkheads and by either the tank top and the nearest deck or by any two decks.

"(b) A 'control station' is a space in which a 24-hour watch is maintained and in which navigating equipment, radio equipment, or fire-recording instruments are located.

"(c) The 'largest compartment' in cargo space is that space between watertight or fire-screen bulkheads from the tank top to the deck at the top of the uppermost space in which cargo may be carried. In shelter-deck type of vessels, it is that space from tank top to main deck plus the volume of the shelter-deck space above the main deck between adjacent watertight or fire-screen bulkheads.

"Fire patrol

"SEC. 753. (a) On all passenger vessels over 100 gross tons, an efficient fire patrol shall be maintained between the hours of 10 p. m. and 6 a. m., so that any outbreak of fire may be promptly detected. On passenger vessels over 500 gross tons, the time and extent of each tour of the patrol shall be shown by a permanent record, which shall be properly kept. The patrol shall cover all spaces not continually occupied, except such cargo and store spaces as are not accessible during a voyage.

"(b) In passenger vessels which have a detecting system installed in the public spaces, the patrol throughout the patroled area shall be at not more than 1-hour intervals. In passenger vessels which have no detecting system in the accommodations, or, which have no detecting system installed in public spaces, the interval between patrols throughout the patrol area shall not be greater than 20 minutes.

"(c) A patrolman, while on watch, shall perform no other duties and shall wear a distinctive uniform or badge.

"(d) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover in detail the methods of recording the rounds of the patrolmen, the equipment they are required to carry, the manner of reporting, the frequency of their reports to the control station, and the number and locations of the required recording stations.

"General alarm system

"SEC. 754. Each vessel over 500 gross tons shall be provided with a general fire-alarm system, operated manually from the control station or stations, which shall be fitted with bells or other sound devices having a distinctive tone and which will effectively arouse all the passengers and all members of the crew. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover in detail the requirements for:

"(1) The size and number of bells (or other appliances) to be installed on each vessel; and

"(2) The manner of operation and the stations from which they are to be controlled; and shall, by inspection and test of the system, make certain that it complies with the requirements of this act.

"Manual fire-alarm system

"SEC. 755. (a) Each vessel over 100 gross tons shall be provided with one or more manually operated fire-alarm boxes, having a distinctive red finish, for each detection zone except freight spaces and such other spaces as may not be accessible during a voyage. The number of the alarm boxes shall be controlled by the size and arrangement of the vessel and they shall be located in the control stations and in such places as corridors, stairway enclosures, and public spaces, so as to be readily accessible to all passengers and crew.

"(b) The manual fire-alarm system shall register, for each detection zone, in the fire-control station and shall automatically ring gongs located in fire-control stations, navigating-control stations, engine rooms, and in the quarters of the fire-fighting crew.

"(c) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover in detail the requirements for this system. Where fire-screen doors or mechanical ventilation, or both, are installed, the operation of any manual fire-alarm box shall result in (1) all fire-screen doors being released, so that they will close automatically, and (2) all the ventilating blowers, except those in the machinery spaces, being stopped.

"Fire-detecting system

"SEC. 756. (a) All passenger vessels having berths for 50 or more passengers and which are not of fireproof construction, in accordance with sections 723 to 741, inclusive, shall be equipped with an automatic self-supervising fire-detecting and alarm system (or systems), which will detect an incipient fire in any part of the passenger, crew, stores, and cargo spaces, and working spaces not continually occupied, so arranged as to bring to the attention of the person (or persons) on watch in the control station (or stations) both audibly and visibly, the existence and location of the fire. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the detailed requirements for the various systems which will be accepted as fulfilling these requirements.

"(b) In new passenger vessels in which the passenger and crew accommodations are of fireproof construction, as required by sections 723 to 741, inclusive, of this act, the fire-detection system may be omitted from these accommodations.

"Fire extinction

"SEC. 757. All vessels shall be equipped with suitable fire-extinguishing apparatus consisting of fire pumps, fire mains, hoses and nozzles, chemical extinguishing equipment, and in places where it is necessary, smothering equipment using steam, foam, carbon-dioxide gas, or other suitable agents. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the capacities of pumps and fire mains, as set forth in title VIII of this act; the size, number, and location of hoses and nozzles; the size, type, and number of chemical extinguishers to be carried; and the type and quantity of smothering agents and equipment required by each vessel.

"Water systems

"Fire hoses

"SEC. 758. In new passenger vessels where fireproof construction is used throughout, the minimum requirements for fire hydrants and hoses shall be as follows:

"(a) The hydrants shall be so placed that (1) when all watertight and fire doors are closed, any point in the accommodations can be reached by one 50-foot length of hose, permanently attached to its own hydrant, and a second stream can be brought to bear by the use of two 50-foot lengths of hose, coupled together and attached to the next nearest hydrant; and (2) that any other point in the vessel can be reached by the streams from two 50-foot lengths of hose each attached to its own hydrant. Each hydrant and hose shall be readily accessible to the passengers or crew and the nozzle of each hose shall deliver, when required, not less than 150 gallons of water per minute in a powerful jet.

"(b) On vessels not exceeding 1,500 gross tons, two hydrants and two 50-foot lengths of hose (with suitable nozzles), each capable of delivering, when required, not less than 67 gallons of water per minute in a powerful jet, may be substituted for one hydrant, hose, and nozzle capable of delivering 150 gallons of water per minute. A similar substitution may be made in the accommodations of vessels exceeding 1,500 gross tons.

"(c) The capacities of fire pumps and fire mains must meet the following requirements:

Gross tonnage	Limits of beam	Minimum number of hoses to be supplied with water at one time	Gallons of water to be delivered by each hose per minute	Minimum gallons of water required per minute
100 and less		Any 2	67	135
101 to 750		Any 3	67	200
751 to 1,500		Any 6	67	400
1,501 to 4,000	Not more than 40 feet	Any 4	150	600
Over 4,000	Not more than 50 feet	Any 5	150	750

"On ships over 4,000 gross tons and over 50 feet beam the minimum number of hydrants and hoses to be supplied with water at one time, at the rate of 150 gallons per minute, shall be increased by 1 for each increment of 10 feet in beam and the minimum gallons of water required per minute shall be increased correspondingly.

"(d) On vessels of less than 100 gross tons, hand pumps may be substituted for power pumps if the Bureau finds that they will afford proper protection.

"SEC. 759. In existing passenger vessels where it is impracticable to fully meet the fireproofing requirements for new passenger vessels of this act, the hydrants shall be arranged in such a manner that any point in the vessel can be reached by two 50-foot lengths of hose, each permanently attached to its own hydrant and the nozzle of each hose shall deliver, when required, not less than 150 gallons of water per minute in a powerful jet. The same substitution of two hydrants, hoses, and nozzles of 67 gallons of water per minute capacity for one of 150 gallons of water per minute capacity, as provided for in section 758 (b) may be permitted. The other requirements shall be the same as for new passenger vessels.

"Vessels using oil fuel

"SEC. 760. In passenger vessels using oil fuel, means shall be provided whereby two powerful jets of water may be rapidly and simultaneously directed into any part of the machinery spaces with suitable nozzles for spraying water on oil without undue disturbance.

"Shore connections

"SEC. 761. A siamese hose inlet shall be provided on each side of the vessel, so located that it is readily available for use by a land fire department or for connection of the ships' hoses. The pipe connecting this siamese hose inlet to the fire main shall be of ample size and shall be protected by a straightaway nonreturn valve so that the water can come in but not go out. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth the arrangement of these siamese hose connections and shall provide for adapters and such other appurtenances as may be necessary.

"Sprinklers

"SEC. 762. In new passenger vessels in which fireproof construction is used throughout in the passenger and crew accommodations, automatic sprinklers will not be required; but they shall be required when other safe and efficient protection is not provided in such spaces as motion-picture booths, film lockers, rooms containing highly inflammable materials, mail and specie rooms, store and baggage rooms, refrigerated storerooms, refrigerated cargo spaces, cargo spaces, where motor vehicles in the operating condition are carried, and coal bunkers. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth in detail the requirements for sprinkler systems in the new fireproof vessels.

"SEC. 763. In new passenger vessels which are built before January 1, 1940, under the provisions of section 743, there shall be installed, in addition to the sprinklers required for new fireproof passenger vessels, complete sprinkler protection for all passenger and crew spaces which contain woodwork or other inflammable structural material. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover in detail the requirements for vessels constructed under this section.

"SEC. 764. In existing passenger vessels, except those covered by section 744 (a) of this act in which sprinklers are not mandatory, and in which inflammable materials have been used for construction purposes, the passenger and crew spaces shall be fully protected by sprinklers in addition to those required for new fireproof passenger vessels. On existing excursion vessels which have less than 25 staterooms, including crew's rooms, a detecting system may be installed in lieu of the sprinklers. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth the detailed requirements in this respect.

"SEC. 765. (a) The automatic sprinkler system installed shall normally be of the dry-pipe system combined with detecting apparatus and so connected that upon the detecting device indicating the existence of a fire, the sprinkler system will be automatically supplied with water. Where the Bureau finds it necessary the wet-pipe system may be required.

"(b) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth in detail the method of installation to be required and shall in each case supervise the location of the sprinkler heads so that they will be most effective in the spaces they protect. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall also prescribe for the proper zoning of the sprinkler system so that the lengths of the various branches will not be excessive, and so that the indicator of the detecting device will locate a fire within reasonable limits.

"Smothering systems

"SEC. 766. Smothering systems using steam, foam, carbon dioxide gas, or other suitable agents, shall be installed in such places as the following: Cargo spaces which are inaccessible during a voyage, trunks of cargo spaces, spaces containing oil-fired boilers or fuel-oil pumps, spaces containing internal-combustion propelling machinery, spaces containing electrical propelling motors and generators, enclosed ventilation systems of electrical machinery, auxiliary machinery spaces, and spaces containing auxiliary internal-combustion engines. With the Bureau's approval, smothering agents may be used in lieu of automatic sprinklers in such spaces as motion-picture booths, film lockers, rooms containing highly inflammable material, mail and specie rooms, store and baggage rooms, refrigerated store rooms, refrigerated cargo spaces, cargo spaces containing motor vehicles in the operating condition, and the bunkers of vessels using coal as fuel. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth in detail the various smothering agents which shall be acceptable for the various spaces and shall give in detail the arrangement of installation, pipe sizes, and tests for the steam system, carbon-dioxide gas system, foam system, and such others as may be approved.

"Special appliances

"Portable fire extinguishers

"SEC. 767. All vessels shall be provided with portable chemical fire extinguishers ready for immediate use in extinguishing incipient fires. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth in detail the number of portable chemical fire extinguishers to be provided on each ship, and their number, contents, and capacity shall be adequate for the type of structure and the spaces they are to protect. They shall be placed in all spaces which are accessible during a voyage and shall be installed near doors and other places where they will be readily available. An adequate number of such extinguishers shall be provided in spaces in which automobiles are carried in the assembled condition to insure proper protection.

"Breathing apparatus

"SEC. 768. All vessels having stateroom accommodations for passengers shall be provided, in the deck department, with sets of self-contained breathing apparatus or gas masks, in accordance with the following table:

Gross tonnage	Limits of beam	Sets of apparatus
Less than 750		2
751–1,500		3
1,501–4,000	Not more than 40 feet	4
Over 4,000	Not more than 50 feet	5

"On vessels over 4,000 gross tons and over 50 feet in beam the minimum number of sets to be supplied shall be increased by 1 for each increment of 10 feet in beam.

"One set of apparatus shall be stowed in the fire-control station and the remainder at points where they will be readily accessible to the fire-fighting crew. In addition to the apparatus required in the table these vessels shall have stowed in each fire and engine room, and easily accessible, a sufficient number of sets of self-contained breathing apparatus for each member of the minimum crew required to keep the propelling and auxiliary machinery and the fire pumps in operation. The breathing apparatus provided in the engineering department shall give ample protection against the refrigerant used. Deck officers, selected petty officers, and the fire and engine room crew shall be trained in the use of breathing apparatus. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth in detail the requirements for breathing apparatus, the method of stowage, the procedure to be followed in its inspection in order that assurance may be had that it is always in good working condition.

"Sand

"SEC. 769. In addition to the foregoing, in every firing space where oil fuel is used, a receptacle containing 10 cubic feet of sand or equivalent material shall be provided together with scoops for distributing it. The Bureau's rules and regulations may prescribe a smaller quantity of sand or equivalent material which may be used on vessels under 1,000 gross tons, and shall give in its rules the substitutes which will be accepted in lieu of sand.

"Tests and examinations

"SEC. 770. All fire-extinguishing appliances and special appliances shall be thoroughly examined and tested by the Bureau's representatives at least once each year. Where carbon dioxide or other similar smothering agents are used, the containers shall be weighed and carefully examined for deterioration; when the weight of the gas is reduced by 10 percent, the cylinders shall be required to be renewed or recharged and, if the containers are found to be corroded or deteriorated, they shall be replaced.

"PART 5. ACCOMMODATIONS FOR OFFICERS AND CREW

"SEC. 781. The Bureau shall give constant attention to the construction, arrangement, sanitation, and ventilation of the quarters and facilities provided on ships of all groups, for the accommodation of the officers and crew.

"Crew spaces

"SEC. 782. In new vessels of groups 1 and 2 which are over 750 gross tons the requirements for crew accommodations shall provide for at least the following:

"(a) Accommodations for the crew shall not be located forward of the forward collision bulkhead nor on a deck which is below the deepest loadline;

"(b) Sleeping accommodations for the crew shall be divided into staterooms no one of which shall berth more than four persons except that on the larger passenger ships, where the stewards and waiters are numerous, rooms may be arranged to accommodate not more than 10 stewards or waiters (or both). So far as is practicable the rooms for watch standers shall be so arranged that all those in a room belong to the same watch and are called at the same time.

"(c) Each stateroom shall be of such a size that there is at least 20 square feet of deck area and a volume of at least 150 cubic feet for each person accommodated. Each person shall have a separate berth and not more than two berths, a lower and an upper, shall be placed between two decks. The berths shall be of metal framework and shall be so arranged that they provide ample room for easy occupancy. The upper berths shall not be obstructed by pipes, ventilating ducts, or other installations which interfere with their proper use. Each stateroom shall be provided with a metal locker for each person accommodated. Each locker shall be not less than 12 inches by 21 inches by 5 feet high and so placed as to be readily accessible. The interior of the locker shall be so arranged as to facilitate the proper stowage of clothes.

"(d) Messrooms shall be provided for all members of the crew which shall be placed as near the galley as is practicable in each case. The messrooms shall be properly equipped with tables and a seat for each person and each messroom shall be of sufficient size to permit easy access to each seat. In vessels of over 5,000 gross tons separate messrooms shall be provided for the deck, engine, and steward groups. On the larger passenger ships, where the stewards and waiters are numerous, arrangements may be made for those in the steward's department to eat in one of the passenger dining rooms before or after the times set apart for the service of meals to passengers.

(e) Bathrooms shall be provided for the deck, engine, and steward groups of the crew in which there shall be installed one shower for each 10 persons or fraction thereof, in the group to be accommodated, and one wash basin for each 4 persons or fraction thereof. The showers and basins shall be supplied with hot and cold fresh water. On small vessels where this is found impracticable one bathroom may be approved. On vessels where the engine group contains 10 or more persons a separate bathroom shall be provided for them. On vessels where the steward group contains six or more persons a separate bathroom shall be provided for them. All bathrooms shall be properly drained and so constructed and arranged that they can be kept in a clean, workable, and sanitary condition.

"(f) Toilets shall be provided for each group of the crew and, except in the smaller vessels where the space is limited and the crew small, they shall be in separate rooms from the bathing and washing facilities. There shall be a seat for each 10 persons or fraction thereof, and, in addition, a urinal for each 10 male persons or fraction thereof in the group to be accommodated. All toilet rooms shall be properly drained and so constructed and arranged that they can be kept in a clean, workable, and sanitary condition.

"(g) On vessels where the crew comprises 12 or more persons a hospital space shall be provided. Except on vessels making a voyage of 24 hours or less from port to port, this space shall be used for the care of the sick and for no other purpose except where an emergency or an unusual occasion, such as a trial trip, makes it necessary. The space shall be completely enclosed so that contagious diseases can be isolated. It shall contain one berth for each 12 persons in the crew (but no more than six berths will be required in any case) and it shall be so constructed and arranged that it can be kept in a clean and sanitary condition.

"(h) Except for such crew spaces as are located in deck houses where, under all ordinary weather conditions, the windows or ports can be kept open, all crew spaces shall be supplied with air by forced ventilation. Each sleeping room and messroom shall be supplied with air equal to 10 times the volume of the room each hour and shall be so ventilated both at sea and in port so long as the spaces are occupied. Each bathroom, toilet, and hospital space shall be supplied with air equal to 15 times the volume of the space each hour and shall also be fitted with exhaust ventilation to remove an equal volume of air so that it is possible to have these spaces properly ventilated when all doors, ports, and other openings are closed.

"(i) All crew spaces shall be adequately heated in cold weather and care shall be taken to insure that both heat and ventilation are supplied in the various spaces so that it will not be necessary to curtail the ventilation in order to have warmth.

"(j) All crew spaces shall be adequately lighted and special provisions shall be made for properly screened reading lights.

"SEC. 783. The Bureau shall cause to be cut in a beam or other part of the permanent structure a legend indicating the purpose for which each space enumerated in section 782 is to be used and the number of persons it may accommodate. A sign conveying the same information shall be placed over the door of each space.

"SEC. 784. So far as is practicable and reasonable the requirements for new vessels, outlined in section 782 of this act, shall be applied to existing vessels of similar type and, in principle, to the vessels of less than 750 gross tons in groups 1 and 2, and to vessels in other groups, to the end that habitable and sanitary accommodations may be provided in each case.

"SEC. 785. So far as is practicable the Bureau shall require an inspection of all crew spaces in vessels of groups 1 and 2 at least once each month. The inspectors shall give particular attention, (1) to the cleanliness and sanitation of these spaces, (2) to insuring that no space is occupied by a greater number of persons than it is authorized to accommodate and (3) to insuring that none of the spaces enumerated in section 782 of this act are used for other purposes than the accommodation of the crew. No person shall be carried in the employ of a ship unless the accommodations are sufficient to care for him in accordance with this act.

"Officers' quarters

"SEC. 786. In new vessels of groups 1 and 2 which are over 1,000 gross tons each licensed officer shall be provided with a separate stateroom suitably equipped and so far as is practicable their quarters shall be located on or above the weather deck.

"SEC. 787. (a) On each new vessel, in groups 1 and 2, a messroom shall be provided for the licensed officers which shall be of sufficient size to seat all the officers at one time and to permit easy access to each seat. If a new cargo vessel is fitted to carry passengers, provision shall be made for seating them in the officers' messroom in addition to the officers or a separate dining room may be provided for them.

"(b) In passenger ships, where the licensed officers are required to have meals in the main dining room, a separate messroom shall be provided where those officers, whose duty interferes with their appearing in the main dining room at the proper time, may have their meals.

"SEC. 788. Bathroom and toilet facilities shall be provided for all officers who do not occupy rooms to which these facilities are attached.

"SEC. 789. The ventilation requirements for officers' quarters shall be at least equal to the requirements for crew spaces, as set forth in section 782 (h) of this act.

"SEC. 790. So far as is practicable and reasonable the requirements for new vessels, outlined in sections 786, 787, 788, and 789 of this act, shall be applied to existing vessels of similar type and, in principle, to vessels of less than 1,000 gross tons in groups 1 and 2, and to vessels in other groups, to the end that habitable and sanitary accommodations may be provided in each case.

"SEC. 791. The tonnage of all of the spaces named in this part shall be deducted from the gross tonnage in arriving at the net or register tonnage of a vessel in addition to any other deductions allowed by law.

"SEC. 792. When the Bureau finds, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, that it is practicable and necessary, in any particular case, they shall require that the minimum requirements, provided for in section 782, be raised.

"TITLE VIII. ENGINEERING

"SEC. 801. The design, construction, installation, and inspection of all types of machinery used on board ship shall be such as to insure safe and reliable operation. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover boilers and pressure vessels, piping, main propelling machinery (of whatever kind), electrical machinery and electrical equipment, and auxiliary machinery, such as emergency generators (and batteries), bilge pumps, fire pumps, steering machinery, watertight door machinery, winches, anchor windlasses, capstans, and whatever other apparatus is required to insure that such machinery or apparatus will function in a safe and reliable manner.

"SEC. 802. In the case of passenger ships, the Bureau shall give unremitting attention to the following requirements:

"(1) That the boilers are of a safe design, properly constructed, and operated at a safe pressure.

"(2) That the main propelling machinery and auxiliary machinery vital to propulsion are of reliable design, properly constructed, and in a safe condition.

"(3) That ample backing power is provided and promptly available under all conditions when under way.

"(4) That the steering gear is of a reliable design, and properly constructed and in a safe condition; and that a satisfactory auxiliary means of steering is provided.

"(5) That the fire mains are of proper design, ample capacity, and in proper working order.

"(6) That the fire pumps are of proper design, ample capacity, and in satisfactory working condition.

"(7) That the bilge-pumping arrangements are of proper design, of ample capacity, and in proper working condition.

"(8) That an adequate source of power and light for emergency use is provided and in proper working condition.

"(9) That where lifeboat winches are required, they are of proper design, properly protected, and in proper working condition.

"BOILERS AND PRESSURE VESSELS

"Boilers

"SEC. 803. (a) The Bureau's rules and regulations covering boilers shall set forth the methods by which the maximum allowable working pressure is to be determined and the classes of materials and the methods of construction acceptable for the various parts to the end that safe operation is insured.

"(b) In the case of new boilers, the plans and stress calculations shall be submitted to the Bureau for approval before work is undertaken. The Bureau shall determine whether the design and materials proposed are safe and satisfactory for the desired maximum working pressure. The Bureau shall, before a boiler is constructed, inspect and test all the materials used in the pressure parts. The Bureau shall assure itself by careful inspection that the boilers, as constructed, comply in all essential respects with the approved plans, that the workmanship is in all respects satisfactory and that the boilers are in all respects acceptable for the maximum allowed working pressure.

"(c) In the case of existing boilers, all parts shall be inspected as minutely as possible and, if necessary, holes drilled to determine thicknesses, whereupon the maximum allowed working pressure shall be arrived at in accordance with the Bureau's rules based on the thinnest material.

"Boilers—Inspections and hydrostatic tests

"SEC. 804. (a) All new boilers shall be subjected to a hydrostatic test before lagging. The pressure used in this test shall be not less than one and one-half times the maximum allowed working pressure.

"(b) All existing boilers shall be critically examined and inspected and given a suitable hydrostatic test annually and whenever they have undergone important repairs.

"(c) In vessels converted from cargo to passenger vessels, the boilers shall be given a special inspection and a hydrostatic test at the time of conversion.

"(d) Evaporators, superheaters, and steam chests, when new, shall be tested to twice the working pressure (except that superheaters which are an integral part of the boiler shall be tested with the boiler and at the same pressure), and thereafter given the same tests as boilers.

"(e) In all hydrostatic tests two of the Bureau's inspectors shall be present and a careful inspection of all pressure parts shall be made before, during, and after the test, in order to ensure that no unusual distortion or weakness has developed.

"(f) After the maximum allowed working pressure has once been fixed no increase in this pressure shall be allowed.

"Unfired pressure vessels

"SEC. 805. The Bureau's rules and regulations covering unfired pressure vessels shall set forth the methods by which the maximum allowable working pressure is to be determined and the classes of materials and the methods of construction acceptable for the various parts to the end that safe operation is ensured.

"(a) In the case of new pressure vessels the plans and stress calculations shall be submitted to the Bureau for approval before work is undertaken. The Bureau shall determine whether the design and materials proposed are safe and satisfactory for the desired maximum working pressure. The Bureau shall assure itself, by careful inspection, that the unfired pressure vessels, as constructed, comply in all essential respects with the approved plans, that the workmanship is in all respects satisfactory and that the unfired pressure vessels are in all respects acceptable for the maximum allowed working pressure.

"(b) In the case of existing unfired pressure vessels all parts shall be inspected as minutely as possible, and, if necessary, holes drilled to determine thicknesses, whereupon the working pressure shall be arrived at in accordance with the Bureau's rules based on the thinnest material.

"Unfired pressure vessels—Inspections and hydrostatic tests

"SEC. 806. Unfired pressure vessels which are permanently installed and used to contain air, gas, liquids at temperatures above the evaporation point at atmospheric pressure, and lethal or noxious chemicals shall be given a suitable hydrostatic test when new. Such pressure vessels as are subject to internal corrosion, such as compressed-air containers and accumulator tanks shall be tested and inspected annually thereafter. Cylindrical containers, such as are used commercially for carbon dioxide, anhydrous ammonia, oxygen, hydrogen, acetylene, and other gases in a highly compressed state, shall be examined for external corrosion annually, and if serious deterioration exists they shall be replaced. The Bureau shall determine suitable intervals at which these cylindrical containers are to be returned to the source of supply so that they may be retested and remarked in accordance with the requirements for similar pressure vessels ashore.

"Safety valves

"SEC. 807. (a) Each boiler and pressure vessel shall be equipped with one or more safety valves or other means for ensuring that no pressure in excess of that allowed is possible. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth the method of determining the size of the safety valves, or other devices, required, and in the case of boilers this shall not be less than that required to relieve the maximum amount of steam the boiler is capable of producing. After each hydrostatic test the Bureau's inspectors shall verify the settings of the safety valves by having them lift under pressure, and two of the Bureau's inspectors shall assure themselves and certify that the safety valves lift at not more than 3 percent above the maximum allowed working pressure.

"(b) The Bureau shall lock, or otherwise secure, one or more of the safety valves on each boiler so that the operating personnel can neither gag it nor increase the pressure for which it is set.

"Piping and fittings

"SEC. 808. (a) The Bureau's rules and regulations covering all essential piping systems on shipboard (such as steam pipes, exhaust pipes, boiler-feed systems, fuel-oil systems, lubricating-oil systems, compressed-air systems, condenser-circulating systems, fire mains, sanitary systems, bilge systems, ballast systems, hydraulic systems, refrigerating systems, drinking-water systems, and such others as may be required), shall set forth the methods by which the maximum allowed working pressure is to be determined, the class of materials and the types of fittings acceptable for each system.

"(b) The piping systems essential to the safety of the vessel (such as steam pipes, boiler-feed pipes, fuel-oil pipes, lubricating-oil pipes, fire mains, and bilge systems) shall be carefully inspected and tested hydrostatically when new and annually thereafter given a hydrostatic test which will give ample assurance of their being in a safe and satisfactory condition.

"(c) Fire mains shall be provided on each ship capable of distributing the entire output of all the pumps, which are available for fire protection, to any group of adjacent fire hydrants in the ship which are capable of discharging the volume of water delivered by the pumps.

"(d) A bilge main shall be provided on each vessel of such a diameter as to fully utilize the capacity of all the pumps available for pumping from it. The bilge main shall be arranged so as to be capable of draining any watertight compartment in the ship under all practicable conditions whether the ship is upright or listed, and the branch pipes from this main shall be proportioned to the size of the compartments they are to drain. Provision shall be made to prevent the compartment served by any bilge suction pipe being flooded in the event of the pipes being severed or otherwise damaged by collision or grounding in any other compartment. All bilge mains and pipes shall be entirely distinct from pipes which may be used for handling water ballast or oil. Other special requirements for piping provided for by regulation XIX of the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929, shall also apply to all vessels covered by this act.

"MAIN PROPELLING MACHINERY

"Main engines

"SEC. 809. (a) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth the requirements for design, material, construction, installation, necessary tests and inspection of all forms of machinery used for the propulsion of vessels. In order that the Bureau may be satisfied that the main propelling machinery (including all shafting, propellers, thrust bearings, stern-tube bearings, and line-shaft bearings) of a new vessel will be satisfactory for the service for which the vessel is intended, it shall require that all essential plans and specifications be submitted to it for approval and the Bureau shall satisfy itself that the proposed machinery is of proper design, is sufficiently rugged, and will provide ample backing power which will be immediately available in an emergency. The Bureau shall assure itself by careful inspection that the machinery, as constructed, complies in all essential respects with the approved plans and specifications, and that the workmanship is in all respects satisfactory.

"(b) If the proposed vessel is classed by the American Bureau of Shipping, the Bureau may accept this classification as indicating that the material and size of the shafting is satisfactory.

"Auxiliaries for main propulsion

"SEC. 810. The rules and regulations promulgated by the Bureau shall provide for the types of auxiliary machinery for new vessels required for the proper operation of their main propelling machinery, such as fuel-oil pumps, fuel-oil heaters, fuel-oil burners, blowers for boiler draft, boiler-feed pumps, feed-water heaters, circulating pumps, condensers, vacuum-producing apparatus, condensate pumps, lubricating-oil pumps and lubricating-oil coolers for steam vessels, and, in the case of turbo-electric drive vessels, such special auxiliaries as may be required for the proper operation of the plant. In like manner, the rules shall provide for the auxiliaries required for vessels equipped with internal-combustion engines for propulsion, whether the drive is direct or by the use of electricity or gears, such as cooling-water pumps, lubricating-oil pumps, lubricating-oil coolers, fuel-oil pumps, air compressors, air coolers, compressed-air containers, exhaust mufflers, and waste-heat boilers (if used). In the case of new vessels the plans and specifications of such auxiliary machinery shall be submitted to the Bureau for approval. The Bureau shall assure itself by an annual inspection that all auxiliary machinery necessary to the safe and proper operation of the main propelling machinery on all new and existing vessels is of rugged design and construction, of ample capacity for the purpose intended, and not liable to derangement in operation.

"Tests for main propelling machinery and auxiliaries

"SEC. 811. (a) New main propelling machinery, together with its necessary auxiliary machinery, shall be given such tests as are necessary to determine that it is suitable and safe for the purpose intended, and, in addition, the plant as a whole shall be operated at full power with the vessel underway.

"(b) In all vessels the main propelling machinery shall be inspected annually in order to insure its being maintained in a safe and satisfactory condition.

"(1) In the case of vessels using turbines for main propulsion, the turbines shall be opened for examination at least once in 4 years, unless some derangement makes more frequent examination necessary. In a ship with multiple turbines they may be examined in succession in such a manner that all will be examined within the 4-year period.

"(2) In the case of ships using internal-combustion engines or reciprocating-steam engines for main propulsion, the cylinders, pistons, and other working parts shall be examined annually. In the case of internal-combustion plants, the examination may be made from time to time during the year so as not to require dismantling all the cylinders at one time.

"(3) Tail shafts shall be withdrawn for examination every 2 years.

"(4) Clearances of stern tube bearings shall be taken and recorded at each drydocking.

"PUMPS

"Fire pumps

"SEC. 812. (a) All vessels of over 100 gross tons shall be equipped with two or more power-operated fire pumps, capable of delivering the volumes of water required by section 758 (c) of this act. Each fire pump shall discharge at a pressure sufficient to deliver its full output of water from the highest outlets in the ship at a minimum pitot-tube pressure of at least 50 pounds per square inch, and in any case at a gage pressure of not less than 100 pounds per square inch at the pump discharge. All fire pumps shall be in readiness for immediate use before the vessel leaves port, and at least one fire pump shall be kept connected for instant use on the fire main at all times when passengers are on board or while the vessel is under way.

"(b) If the boiler and engine rooms are not in separate watertight compartments, one of the fire pumps shall be situated outside the machinery space, and in any case where two or more pumps are required they shall not all be fitted in the same space.

"(c) No pump used on the fire main shall have any connection with a pipe which may be used for handling oil or oily water.

"(d) Sanitary flushing pumps may be used as fire pumps when they operate at the required pressure.

"Bilge pumps

"SEC. 813. (a) All vessels shall be provided with an efficient pumping plant capable of pumping from and draining any watertight compartment under all practicable conditions, whether the ship is upright or listed. Each passenger vessel in groups 1, 2, and 3 which is 180 feet in length or more shall have three power-operated pumps connected to the bilge main, one of which may be operated by the propelling unit. On passenger ships over 300 feet long, or which have a sufficient passenger capacity to warrant it, at least one of the power-operated bilge pumps shall be of an approved submersible type capable of operating continuously when submerged under a head of water equal to a height from the inner bottom to the bulkhead deck. A source of power situated above the bulkhead deck shall be available for this pump in any case of emergency. Each submersible bilge pump shall be capable of pumping directly from the compartment in which it is located and from all bilges through the bilge main under all normal and emergency conditions, and the control for the pump and all valves necessary for these operations shall be capable of being operated from above the bulkhead deck as well as locally.

"(b) All main condenser circulating pumps shall have a direct suction, of a size to be prescribed by the Bureau, to the bilges of the compartments in which they are installed.

"(c) Where practicable, the power-operated bilge pumps shall be placed in separate watertight compartments, so arranged or situated that these compartments will not readily be flooded by the same damage.

"(d) Each power-operated bilge pump shall be capable of giving a speed of water through the main bilge pipe of not less than 400 feet per minute, and it shall have a separate direct suction (or suctions) to the compartment in which it is situated of a diameter not less than that of the bilge main.

"(e) Other special requirements for bilge pumps shall not be less than those prescribed by regulation XIX of the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, 1929.

"SEC. 814. On new vessels and annually on all vessels, each of the pumps enumerated in sections 812 and 813 shall be tested to demonstrate that it is in condition to meet the requirements, except that submersible bilge pumps need not be submerged in making the tests on board ship.

"SEC. 815. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall provide for the requirements for all pumps used for other purposes, and shall give special attention to pumps for operating hydraulic watertight doors.

"SEC. 816. In the case of new vessels the plans and specifications of the pumps provided for in sections 812 to 815, inclusive, shall be submitted to the Bureau for approval.

"Electrical installation

"SEC. 817. The construction, insulation, installation, and the tests to be performed on new apparatus and wiring shall be such as to insure safe and efficient operation of all electrical apparatus and wiring used on board ship. The Bureau's rules shall also prescribe the tests and inspections for the electrical systems in all vessels.

"SEC. 818. Vessels in groups 1, 2, and 3 shall be provided with two or more electric generating sets of such capacity that the essential peak load for the proper operation of the vessel at sea can be carried if one of the sets is disabled. In addition to the foregoing, there shall be installed above the bulkhead deck a source of supply independent of the main power installation and of a capacity sufficient to carry the emergency load for a period of at least 12 hours. In the case of passenger vessels this independent emergency source of supply shall consist of one or more electric generating sets driven by Diesel engines, of sufficient capacity to carry the full emergency load for at least 36 hours, in conjunction with a storage battery of sufficient capacity to carry the emergency load during the time that elapses between the failure of the main generators and the starting of the emergency generator.

"SEC. 819. Vessels of group 4 shall be provided with at least one electric generating set capable of carrying the maximum sea load and one for emergency and port use. In addition, on passenger vessels in such group there shall be installed above the bulkhead deck a storage battery with sufficient capacity to carry the emergency load for at least 6 hours.

"SEC. 820. Vessels in group 5 shall be provided with at least one electric generating set and a storage battery with sufficient capacity to carry the emergency load for at least 6 hours. In passenger vessels in this group this emergency source of supply shall be installed above the bulkhead deck.

"SEC. 821. (a) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth the requirements for storage batteries and shall provide for the proper installation of these units and for the proper ventilation of the spaces they occupy to insure safe and efficient operation.

"(b) Where electrically operated watertight doors are installed they shall be supplied with independent storage-battery capacity sufficient to comply with the requirements of section 831 (c) of this act.

"SEC. 822. (a) In all vessels the emergency switchboard shall be installed above the bulkhead deck and close to the emergency source of supply. This switchboard shall be so arranged that all emergency circuits lead from it and that its normal supply is received from the main plant. The arrangement shall be such that in case of the failure of this normal source of supply, the emergency load will be automatically transferred to the storage batteries. The emergency circuits shall include at least the following:

"(1) Watertight door circuits.
"(2) Navigating lights.
"(3) Machinery space lights.
"(4) Radio-room lights.
"(5) Passenger and crew exits and passageways.
"(6) Emergency power station lights.
"(7) Communications between bridge and engine room and steering station, including telegraphs.
"(8) Emergency alarm system.
"(9) Lifeboat gear and floodlights.
"(10) Emergency lights in public rooms.
"(11) Interior communications.
"(12) Emergency bilge pumps.
"(13) Navigating instruments.
"(14) Power for radio set.

"(b) In vessels equipped with Diesel emergency generating sets the storage batteries shall be capable of supplying at least items (1) to (8), inclusive, of the above list until such time as the emergency generating set is in operation and able to supply all the circuits connected to the emergency switchboard.

"SEC. 823. Where electric drive is used for main propulsion, the Bureau shall require the plans and specifications for the electrical apparatus to be submitted to it for approval and the Bureau shall satisfy itself that the proposed apparatus is of proper design, is sufficiently rugged, and will provide ample backing power in an emergency. In the case of other electrical apparatus where standard marine equipment is used, the installation may be made and the apparatus proven to be satisfactory by test after installation.

"SEC. 824. (a) On a new vessel a careful inspection shall be made to ensure that all electric wiring is properly insulated and protected where it passes through any metal structure or part and that it is properly supported throughout.

"(b) On a new vessel all electrical equipment shall be tested by operation at full capacity so far as may be practicable and electric drive machinery shall be operated at full power with the ship under way. All circuits shall be free from grounds and properly protected by fuses or circuit breakers.

"SEC. 825. At the annual inspection on all vessels, all electrical apparatus and wiring shall be carefully examined and tested for weaknesses in insulation and for grounds. Such inspection shall ensure that no circuit is overfused or otherwise arranged so as to permit it to carry an excess of current.

"SHIP'S SERVICE AUXILIARIES

"Steering machinery

"SEC. 826. (a) The design, construction, installation, tests, and inspection of power-operated steering gears used on board vessels shall be such as to ensure safe and efficient operation. In order that the Bureau may be satisfied that the steering gear of a new vessel will be satisfactory for the service for which the vessel is intended, it shall require that all essential plans and specifications be submitted to it for approval. In each case the Bureau must be satisfied that the proposed steering gear is of proper design and is sufficiently rugged for the service in which it is to be used.

"(b) Each vessel shall be equipped with an auxiliary means of steering by the use of which she may be kept on her course in case the main steering gear is deranged, and the arrangement shall be such that the main gear can be disengaged and the auxiliary gear put into operation with a minimum of delay. Proper arrangements shall be made for insuring that steering commands can be communicated from the navigation control station to the operator at the auxiliary steering gear in a satisfactory manner.

"(c) The main steering gear shall be capable of putting the rudder from hard over right to hard over left rudder in 30 seconds while the vessel is going ahead at full speed.

"(d) Telemotors and other means for the remote control of power-operated steering gears shall be installed in such a manner as to be protected against injury or derangement by cold weather, heavy seas, or accident.

"(e) In new vessels the steering gears shall be given a trial when the vessel is under way at full speed, which shall affirmatively demonstrate that they comply in all respects with the requirements and thereafter, at each annual inspection they shall be carefully examined to determine that they are maintained in proper working condition.

"Elevators

"SEC. 827. (a) The design, construction, installation, and operation of all types of elevators and dumbwaiters used on board ships shall be such as to ensure their efficient and safe operation. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall follow the best practice in use ashore with such special requirements as may be necessary for shipboard installation in order that the minimum hazard may be involved in the use of these devices.

"(b) All elevators shall be carefully inspected and tested when new, and annually thereafter. Such inspections shall ensure that the cable, brakes, and emergency devices are in safe and satisfactory condition. A placard showing the capacity and date of the last inspection shall be posted in each passenger elevator.

"Anchor windlasses

"SEC. 828. (a) Suitable means for raising the anchors on all vessels shall be provided.

"(b) In a new vessel the anchor windlass shall be tested to demonstrate its suitability. In the case of a power-operated windlass the mechanism shall be capable of raising the bower anchors under all conditions.

"(c) At the annual inspection the windlass shall be carefully examined to determine that no part is so worn or deranged that its failure is probable.

"Winches

"SEC. 829. (a) All types of winches and capstans used on board ship shall be of suitable design and properly placed so as to reduce the hazard connected with their use to a minimum.

"(b) In the case of new vessels upon which lifeboat winches are to be installed and on existing vessels where new equipment for this purpose is to be installed the plans and specifications of the installations shall be submitted to the Bureau for approval before such installation commences.

"(c) In the case of new vessels all of the winches and capstans shall be tested to demonstrate that they are suitable for the work. In the case of the lifeboat winches covered by paragraph (b) above, their suitability for and reliability in lowering the lifeboats shall be demonstrated.

"(d) At the annual inspection all the winches and capstans shall be carefully examined to determine that no part is so worn or deranged that its failure is probable and all of the lifeboat winches shall be tested in the same manner as for a new ship.

"Refrigerating machinery

"SEC. 830. (a) All the refrigerating apparatus used on board ship and the types of refrigerants and methods of installation to be permitted on passenger ships shall be such as to ensure safe and efficient operation.

"(b) At the time of the original installation and at such annual inspection, examinations and tests shall be made to determine that all piping and pressure parts which contain the refrigerant are tight and in good condition and that the space containing the apparatus is properly ventilated.

"Power operated watertight doors

"SEC. 831. (a) All machinery necessary for the operation of watertight doors shall be such as to ensure safe and efficient operation and shall be of rugged design and construction, and be so installed as to ensure the closing of the doors, whether the ship is upright or listed. In the case of new vessels plans and specifications of such machinery shall be submitted to the Bureau for approval before the work is undertaken.

"(b) All power operated watertight doors shall be capable of being operated from a central control on or near the bridge and locally at the door. This latter control shall be such that, if the doors have been closed from the central control, a door opened locally will close automatically as soon as the local control is released. These watertight doors shall also be provided with proper means for operating them by hand, both locally and from above the bulkhead deck.

"(c) The power operated watertight door system shall be fitted with accumulator capacity sufficient to close the doors three times and open them twice when the power source is shut down.

"TITLE IX. EQUIPMENT

"PART 1. LIFESAVING APPLIANCES

"General requirements

"SEC. 901. (a) Every vessel documented under the laws of the United States shall be provided with equipment for the saving of life so as to give each and every person on board the maximum security in case of disaster. At no time on any voyage shall a vessel have on board more persons than its lifesaving equipment will accommodate except in an emergency.

"(b) Equipment for the saving of life shall be of a type approved by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation. The Bureau shall list the types of appliances or arrangements approved by it, but other appliances or arrangements may be approved by the Bureau after suitable trials or tests have made it evident that they are at least as effective as the types listed.

"(c) The dimensions of each lifeboat and the number of persons which it is authorized to carry shall be marked on it in clear permanent characters of such size and in such location as may be prescribed by the Bureau. Life rafts and buoyant apparatus shall be marked in the same manner with the number of persons they are authorized to carry.

"(d) The name of the vessel shall be painted or branded on each piece of portable lifesaving equipment (such as lifeboats, life rafts, life floats, buoyant apparatus, life buoys, and life preservers) carried thereon.

"SEC. 902. (a) In the case of each new passenger vessel, plans shall be submitted to the Bureau showing in detail the proposed arrangements for stowing and handling lifeboats, life rafts, and buoyant apparatus and means of access to such equipment.

"(b) So far as practicable all passenger vessels in groups 1, 2, and 3 shall carry the required lifeboats attached to the davits and ready for lowering.

"(c) The requirement provided in paragraph (a) shall apply to any existing passenger vessel, as nearly as the construction and arrangements of the vessel will permit.

"Davits, lifeboats, life rafts, and buoyant apparatus

"SEC. 903. The following table applies to passenger vessels of groups 1, 2, and 3, and fixes, according to the registered length of the vessel:

"(A) The minimum number of sets of davits to be provided, to each of which shall be attached an approved lifeboat.

"(B) The minimum number of davits which may be authorized by the Bureau under exceptional circumstances.

"(C) The minimum lifeboat capacity required, including the lifeboat attached to davits and the additional boats.

"(D) The minimum lifeboat capacity required for vessels of certain groups.

Registered length of the vessel	(A)[1] Minimum number of sets of davits	(B)[1] Smaller number of sets of davits authorized exceptionally	(C)[2] Minimum capacity of lifeboats (cubic feet)	(D)[3] Minimum capacity of lifeboats (cubic feet)

"[1] When the length of the vessel exceeds 1,030 feet, the Bureau shall determine the minumum number of sets of davits for that vessel.

"[2] For the purpose of this table, the capacity of a boat of class 1-A is obtained by multiplying the number of persons for which the boat is certified by 10 (class 1-B boats use 9) to obtain the capacity in cubic feet.

"[3] When the length of a ship is under 100 feet or over 550 feet the cubic capacity of the lifeboats shall be prescribed by the Bureau.

"Passenger vessels of group 1

"(Ocean-going vessels navigating more than 20 miles offshore)

"SEC. 904. (a) Passenger vessels of group 1 shall be provided with sets of davits in accordance with their registered length, as provided in column A of the table in section 903.

"(b) When the Bureau finds it is neither practicable nor reasonable to place on such a vessel the number of sets of davits required by column A, authorization may be granted by the Bureau, under exceptional conditions, to fit a smaller number of sets of davits, but this number shall not be less than the minimum number fixed by column B of the table in section 903.

"(c) A greater number of sets of davits shall not be required than the number of lifeboats necessary to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry.

"(d) Each set of davits shall have an approved lifeboat attached to it. If the lifeboats attached to davits do not provide sufficient accommodation for all persons the vessel is certified to carry, additional lifeboats of one of the standard types shall be provided. One additional lifeboat shall, in the first place, be stowed under each of the boats attached to davits. After these have been fitted, other boats shall be carried inboard until accommodation for all such persons has been provided.

"(e) In lieu of the boats which may be required to be stowed inboard under the provisions set forth above, the Bureau may, if it finds that life rafts will be more readily available and otherwise more satisfactory than these lifeboats in case of emergency, allow life rafts to be carried: Provided, That the total capacity of the boats on the vessel shall be at least equal to the minimum capacity required by column C, and the accommodations thus provided in rafts shall in no case exceed 25 percent of the accommodations necessary for all the persons the vessel is certified to carry.

"(f) A greater number of lifeboats shall not be required than the number of boats necessary to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry.

"(g) Approved buoyant apparatus sufficient to accommodate 25 percent of all persons the vessel is certified to carry, shall be required in addition to the other lifesaving equipment specified in this section.

"Passenger vessels of group 2

"(Great Lakes vessels. Ocean-going vessels navigating less than 20 miles offshore)

"SEC. 905. (a) Passenger vessels of group 2 shall be provided with sets of davits in accordance with their registered length, as provided in column A, of the table in section 903.

"(b) When the Bureau finds it is neither practicable nor reasonable to place on such a vessel the number of sets of davits required by column A, authorization may be granted by the Bureau, under exceptional conditions, to fit a smaller number of sets of davits, but this number shall not be less than the minimum number fixed by column B of the table in section 903.

"(c) A greater number of sets of davits shall not be required than the number of lifeboats necessary to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry.

"(d) Each set of davits shall have an approved lifeboat attached to it. If the lifeboats attached to davits do not provide sufficient accommodation for at least 75 percent of all persons the vessel is certified to carry, additional lifeboats of one of the standard types shall be provided. One such additional lifeboat shall in the first place be stowed under each of the lifeboats attached to davits. After these have been fitted, the remaining lifeboats shall be carried inboard until the total boatage on board is sufficient to accommodate at least 75 percent of the persons the vessel is certified to carry, or to bring the complement of lifeboat capacity up to the minimum provided in column D, whichever is the greater. The remainder of the equipment required to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry shall be provided by lifeboats of one of the standard types, by approved life rafts, or by other approved buoyant apparatus.

"(e) A greater number of lifeboats shall not be required than the number necessary to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry.

"(f) Approved buoyant apparatus sufficient to accommodate 10 percent of all persons the vessel is certified to carry shall be required in addition to the lifesaving equipment specified in this section.

"Motor-propelled lifeboats

"SEC. 906. All passenger vessels of groups 1 and 2 shall be provided with motor-propelled lifeboats, as follows:

"(1) Where the number of lifeboats carried is more than 13, 1 shall be a motor-propelled lifeboat.

"(2) Where the number of lifeboats carried is more than 19, 2 shall be motor-propelled lifeboats.

"(3) Any lifeboat certified to carry 100 or more persons shall be motor-propelled.

"(4) Any lifeboat which is certified to carry 60 or more persons, if not a motor-propelled lifeboat, shall be equipped with a hand-operated propeller.

"Passenger vessels of group 3

"(Ocean-going or Great Lakes vessels navigating partially protected waters)

"SEC. 907. (a) Passenger vessels of group 3 shall be provided with sets of davits in accordance with their registered length, as given in column A of the table in section 903.

"(b) When the Bureau finds it is neither practicable nor reasonable to place on such a vessel the number of sets of davits required by column A, authorization may be granted by the Bureau, under exceptional conditions, to fit a smaller number of sets of davits, but this number shall not be less than the minimum number fixed by column B of the table in section 903.

"(c) A greater number of sets of davits shall not be required than the number of lifeboats necessary to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry.

"(d) Each set of davits shall have an approved lifeboat attached to it. If the lifeboats attached to davits do not provide accommodation for at least 50 percent of all persons the vessel is certified to carry, additional lifeboats of one of the standard types shall be provided. One such additional lifeboat shall in the first place be stowed under each of the lifeboats attached to davits. After these have been fitted, the remaining lifeboats shall be carried inboard until the total boatage on board is sufficient to accommodate at least 50 percent of the persons the vessel is certified to carry, or to bring the complement of lifeboat capacity up to the minimum provided in column D, whichever is the greater. The remainder of the required equipment required to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry shall be provided by lifeboats of one of the standard types, by approved life rafts, or by other approved buoyant apparatus.

"(e) A greater number of lifeboats shall not be required than the number necessary to accommodate all persons the vessel is certified to carry.

"Accident boats

"SEC. 908. Passenger vessels of groups 1, 2, and 3 shall carry on each side of the ship a lifeboat of suitable design for doing rescue work which shall at all times be ready for immediate use. These boats, together with the davits and necessary appliances serving them, shall be provided with such equipment as the regulations of the Bureau may require.

"Passenger vessels of groups 4 and 5

"(Vessels navigating bays, sounds, and protected waters)

"(Vessels navigating rivers, harbors, and small lakes)

"SEC. 909. Passenger vessels of groups 4 and 5 shall be provided with such number and types of davits, lifeboats, life rafts, buoyant apparatus, and other lifesaving appliances and equipment as the Bureau shall find necessary. The Bureau shall regulate the capacity of such lifesaving appliances and equipment so as to approach as nearly as is practicable the requirements for passenger vessels in group 3, giving due consideration to the seasonal hazards of the waters navigated.

"Excursion boats

"SEC. 910. Passenger vessels, under such regulations as the Bureau may prescribe, may be granted a written excursion permit. The permit shall state the additional number of passengers which the vessel may carry, the length and extent of the excursion, and the number and kind of lifesaving appliances and equipment that shall be provided for the safety of such additional passengers.

"Cargo vessels

"SEC. 911. (a) Cargo vessels which carry passengers shall carry sufficient lifeboats, under davits, to accommodate all persons on board, and the number, capacity, and type of such boats shall be prescribed by the Bureau.

"(b) Vessels which do not carry passengers shall carry sufficient lifeboats to accommodate all persons on board, and, if found practicable by the Bureau, these shall be carried under approved davits or cranes.

"Miscellaneous vessels

"SEC. 912. All other vessels, whether mechanically propelled or not (such as towed passenger barges, moored club or entertainment vessels, and all other vessels not otherwise provided for), shall be provided with such numbers and types of davits, lifeboats, life rafts, buoyant apparatus, and other lifesaving appliances and equipment as the Bureau finds to be necessary for the purpose of safeguarding the lives of all on board.

"Stowage of lifeboats, life rafts, and buoyant apparatus

"General arrangement of boat decks

"SEC. 913. (a) In the arrangement of boat decks care shall be taken to provide not only for sufficient space for the stowage of all lifeboats, life rafts, and buoyant apparatus required but also for working space necessary for handling and lowering them on each side of the vessel with safety and rapidity, even under unfavorable conditions of list and trim. The vessel's sides in way of lifeboats shall be clear of obstructions so that that there will be no interference with the proper lowering of boats even when the vessel is listing.

"(b) Adequate provision shall be made for access of passengers to the embarkation deck so that they may be controlled, marshaled, and finally embarked in the lifeboats within the shortest possible time and in good order.

"(c) Decks carrying lifeboats, life rafts, or buoyant apparatus shall be kept clear of obstructions which might interfere with the immediate launching of such equipment.

"Stowage of boats

"SEC. 914. (a) In accordance with the requirements of sections 904, 905, and 907 two lifeboats may be stowed one above the other, or fitted one within the other, subject to such conditions as the Bureau may impose, but the arrangements for all lifeboats under davits shall be such that the lifeboats do not require lifting before launching.

"(b) Lifeboats may be stowed on more than one deck only on condition that proper measures are taken to prevent lifeboats on a lower deck becoming fouled by boats stowed on a deck above.

"(c) Davits of approved form shall be so disposed on one or more decks as to permit lifeboats placed under them to be safely lowered without interference from the operations of any other davits.

"(d) Lifeboats and life rafts additional to those lifeboats stowed under boats attached to davits may be stowed across a deck, bridge, or poop, and so secured that they will have the best chance of floating free of the vessel if there is not time to launch them. As large a number of these additional lifeboats as possible shall be capable of being launched on either side of the vessel by means of approved appliances for transferring them from one side of the deck to the other.

"(e) Lifeboats shall not be placed in the bows of the vessel nor in any position in which when launched they would be brought into dangerous proximity of the propellers or in danger of being damaged against the counter of the ship after the boat has been lowered to the water.

"Stowage of life rafts and buoyant apparatus

"SEC. 915. Life rafts and buoyant apparatus shall be stowed as follows:

"(a) They shall not impede in any way prompt handling of lifeboats or the marshaling of persons on board at the embarkation stations.

"(b) They shall not be stowed in any deck erection nor on top of deck houses nor in other isolated positions from which they cannot be launched directly into the water.

"(c) They shall not be secured to the deck except by lashings which can be easily slipped, but they may be stowed in tiers one above the other (in which case the units shall be kept apart sufficiently to prevent them sticking together) and supported on suitable distance pieces.

"(d) Means shall be provided to prevent shifting.

"Types and basic requirements for construction of lifeboats

"SEC. 916. (a) The standard types of boats are classified as follows:

"Class I: Open boats with rigid sides having either (A) internal buoyancy only, or (B) internal and external buoyancy.

"Class II: (A) Open boats with internal and external buoyancy, upper parts of sides collapsible; and (B) decked boats with either fixed or collapsible watertight bulwarks.

"Class II lifeboats shall not be permitted on new vessels of the United States or as replacements on existing vessels of the United States.

"(b) No lifeboat shall be approved the buoyancy of which depends upon the previous adjustment of one of the principal parts of the hull.

"(c) No lifeboat shall be approved the weight of which when laden with persons and equipment exceeds 20 tons of 2,240 pounds.

"(d) Each lifeboat fitted on vessels navigating unprotected waters shall have a minimum capacity of 125 cubic feet.

"(e) Lifeboats shall have a mean sheer at least equal to 4 percent of their length.

"(f) The air tanks of lifeboats shall be so placed as to secure stability when fully laden under adverse weather conditions.

"(g) In boats certified to carry 100 or more persons, the volume of the buoyancy shall be increased to provide adequate safety.

"(h) The buoyancy of a wooden boat of class I–A shall be provided by watertight air tanks, the total volume of which shall be at least equal to 10 percent of the cubic capacity of the boat.

"(i) The buoyancy of a metal lifeboat of class I–A shall not be less than that required above for a wooden lifeboat of the same cubic capacity, the volume of the watertight air tanks being increased to ensure that the metal lifeboat has the same total buoyancy as the wooden lifeboat.

"(j) The internal buoyancy of a wooden lifeboat of class I–B shall be provided by watertight air tanks, the total volume of which is at least 7½ percent of the cubic capacity of the lifeboat.

"(k) The external buoyancy of class I–B lifeboats may be of cork or of any other equally efficient material, but such buoyancy shall not be obtained by the use of rushes, cork shavings, loose granulated cork, or any other loose granulated substance, or by any means dependent upon inflation by air.

"(l) If the external buoyancy of a class I–B lifeboat is of cork, its volume, for a wooden lifeboat, shall not be less than thirty-three thousandths of the cubic capacity of the boat; if of any material other than cork, its volume and distribution shall be such that the buoyancy and stability of the lifeboat are not less than that of a similar lifeboat provided with buoyancy of cork.

"(m) The buoyancy of a metal lifeboat of class I–B shall not be less than that required above for a wooden boat of the same cubic capacity, the volume of the watertight air tanks and that of external buoyancy being increased to ensure that the metal lifeboat has the same total buoyancy as the wooden lifeboat.

"(n) A motor-propelled lifeboat carried as a part of the lifesaving equipment of a vessel, whether required by section 906 or not, shall comply with the requirements for approved lifeboats of class I–A or I–B and the volume of the internal buoyancy and, where fitted, the external buoyancy shall be increased in sufficient proportion to compensate for the difference between the weight of the motor, the searchlight, and the radio telegraph installation and their accessories, and the weight of the additional persons which the boat could accommodate if the motor, searchlight, and the radio telegraph installation and their accessories were removed.

"(o) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the requirements for freeboard on all lifeboats to the end that these boats when fully loaded may have ample freeboard and be in a safe condition to operate in a seaway.

"(p) All boats fitted as lifeboats shall be of sufficient strength to enable them to be safely lowered into the water when loaded with their full complement of persons and equipment.

"Davits and falls

"SEC. 917. (a) Davits, blocks, falls, and all other lifeboat gear shall be of such design and strength that the lifeboats can be safely lowered with their full complement of persons and equipment, with the vessel listed to 15 degrees either way and trimmed 5 degrees down by the head or stern.

"(b) Davits shall be fitted with a gear of sufficient power to insure that the boats, when fully equipped and manned but not otherwise loaded with their complement of persons, can be rigged out against the maximum list at which the lowering of boats is possible.

"(c) Lifeboat davit falls shall be of a length sufficient to reach the water with the vessel at her lightest seagoing draft and a list of 15 degrees either way.

"(d) Lifeboat davit falls shall be in readiness for immediate service at all times. They shall be protected from ice and shall not be painted.

"(e) Where more than one lifeboat is served by the same set of davits, if the falls are of rope, separate falls shall be provided to serve each lifeboat, but where wire falls are used with mechanical appliances for recovering them rapidly separate falls need not be provided. The appliances used shall be such as to insure lowering the boats rapidly in succession. Where mechanical appliances are fitted for the recovery of the falls efficient hand gear shall also be provided.

"Determination of capacity of lifeboats

"SEC. 918. (a) The cubic capacity of a lifeboat of class I, shall be determined by Stirling's (Simpson's) rule or by any other method giving the same degree of accuracy. The capacity of a square-sterned boat shall be calculated as if the boat had a pointed stern. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall give in detail the method by which the cubic capacity shall be determined.

"(b) The Bureau shall limit the number of persons allowed in lifeboats with very fine ends and in lifeboats with very full form.

"(c) The cubic capacity of a motor lifeboat shall be obtained by deducting from the gross cubic capacity a volume equal to that occupied by the motor and its accessories, and the radio telegraph installation and the searchlight, with their accessories, when carried.

"(d) The number of persons which a boat of either of the standard types can accommodate shall be equal to the greatest whole number obtained by dividing the capacity in cubic feet by the standard unit of capacity, as defined below, for each class of approved lifeboat.

	Unit of capacity
Class I–A	10 cubic feet
Class I–B	9 cubic feet

"(e) No lifeboat shall be marked for a greater number of persons than that obtained in the manner specified in paragraph (d). When such number is greater than the number of persons for which there are proper seating accommodations with the lifeboat fully equipped, such number shall be reduced so that with all persons wearing life preservers, when seated, they do not interfere in any way with the use of the oars.

"(f) In the tests for determining the number of persons which a lifeboat or life raft can accommodate, each person shall be assumed to be an adult person wearing a life preserver.

"Life rafts

"SEC. 919. Every approved life raft shall conform to the following requirements:

"(a) No life raft shall be considered as such unless it has a capacity for at least 16 persons.

"(b) It shall be fitted with fixed or collapsible bulwarks of wood, canvas, or other suitable material on both sides.

"(c) Material and workmanship entering into the construction shall be adequate for the purpose intended.

"(d) It shall be effective and stable when floating either way up.

"(e) It shall have a life line secured properly around the sides and ends of the raft, festooned to the gunwales in bights not longer than 3 feet, with a seine float in each bight.

"(f) It shall be of such strength that it can be launched or thrown from the vessel's deck without being damaged, and shall be of such size and weight that it may be handled without mechanical appliances.

"(g) It shall have a deck area of not less than 4 square feet for each person it can accommodate.

"(h) The number of persons allowed on any raft shall not exceed the number afforded proper seating capacity without interfering with the use of the oars.

"(i) It shall have for each person carried not less than 3 cubic feet of air tanks or equivalent buoyancy, and such air tanks or equivalent buoyancy shall not be dependent upon inflation by air. The air tanks or equivalent buoyancy shall be placed as near as possible to the sides of the life raft, and the life raft shall effectively support the occupants out of water. The platform shall be not less than 6 inches above the water level when the raft is loaded with its full complement of persons and equipment.

"Buoyant apparatus

"SEC. 920. (a) As used in this act the term 'buoyant apparatus' means buoyant deck seats, buoyant deck chairs, and life floats or other apparatus, having buoyancy, except lifeboats, life rafts, life buoys, and life preservers. No buoyant apparatus shall be approved which requires any adjustment or preparation before use in emergency.

"(b) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall give in detail the requirements for buoyant apparatus but this apparatus shall conform to the following general requirements:

"(1) Its construction shall be of material and workmanship adequate for the purpose intended.

"(2) It shall be effective and stable floating either way up.

"(3) It shall have a life line securely becketed around the outside.

"(4) It shall be of such size, strength, and weight as to be handled without mechanical appliances and thrown without damage from the deck where stowed.

"(5) It shall have air tanks or equivalent buoyancy placed as near as possible to its sides.

"(6) If the apparatus depends for its buoyancy on air, it shall not require to be inflated before use in an emergency.

"(c) The number of persons any type of buoyant apparatus will support shall be determined as follows: (1) The number of pounds of iron the apparatus is capable of supporting in fresh water, divided by 32; or (2) the perimeter of the apparatus measured in feet along the line of the points of attachment of the life lines, divided by unity, whichever is the least.

"Equipment in general

"SEC. 921. (a) Articles of equipment for lifeboats, life rafts, and buoyant apparatus shall be of good quality, efficient for the purpose they are intended to serve, and kept in good condition.

"(b) Lifeboats, life rafts, and buoyant apparatus shall be fully equipped before the vessel leaves port, and the equipment shall remain in the boat, raft, or buoyant apparatus throughout the voyage. It shall be unlawful to stow in any boat, raft, or buoyant apparatus articles other than those herein required.

"(c) Loose equipment shall be securely attached to the boat, raft, or buoyant apparatus to which it belongs.

"Equipment for lifeboats

"SEC. 922. (a) Lifeboats, except those hereinafter specified, shall be equipped as follows:

"(1) Bailer: One bailer of sufficient size and suitable for bailing, with lanyard attached.

"(2) Bucket: One galvanized iron bucket.

"(3) Compass: One efficient compass.

"(4) Distress lights: A watertight metal case containing 12 self-igniting red lights.

"(5) Drinking cups: Two enameled drinking cups.

"(6) Hatchets: Two hatchets.

"(7) Lantern: A lantern filled with oil and trimmed.

"(8) Life line: A life line becketed around the outside.

"(9) Life preserver: Two life preservers.

"(10) Locker: A suitable locker or box for the stowage and preservation of the small items of equipment.

"(11) Mast: A suitable mast or masts with one good sail at least, and proper gear for each.

"(12) Matches: One box of friction matches in a watertight container.

"(13) Milk: One pound of condensed milk for each person which the lifeboat is certified to carry.

"(14) Oars: A single banked complement of oars, two spare oars, and a steering oar. One and a half sets of thole-pins or rowlocks attached to the lifeboat by separate chains. A boat hook.

"(15) Painter: One painter.

"(16) Plugs: Two plugs for each plug hole. Drain holes, fitted with automatic plugs, shall be provided with two caps attached by chains.

"(17) Propellers (hand operated): Lifeboats may be fitted with a hand-operated propeller of an improved type.

"(18) Provisions: An airtight receptacle containing 2 pounds of provisions for each person.

"(19) Rudder: One rudder, fitted with suitable tiller.

"(20) Sea anchor: One sea anchor.

"(21) Storm oil: One container holding 1 gallon of vegetable or animal oil, so constructed that the oil can be easily distributed on the water and so arranged that it can be attached to the sea anchor.

"(22) Water breakers: Wooden breakers or other suitable containers, containing at least 1 quart of fresh water for each person, and proper means provided for withdrawing the water. (Vessels navigating on fresh water only are exempt from this requirement.)

"(23) In the case of a ship which carries passengers in the North Atlantic north of 35° north latitude, only a proportion of the boats, to be fixed by the Bureau, need be equipped with masts and sails, and then only one-half of the quantity of condensed milk need be carried.

"(b) In addition to this equipment, motor lifeboats shall carry two boat hooks, but need not carry a mast or sails, nor more than four rowing oars, and one steering oar.

"(c) The motor lifeboats which a vessel is required to carry shall each be fitted with a radio installation and a searchlight.

"(d) The motor and its accessories shall be suitably enclosed to insure operation under adverse weather conditions and shall be capable of going astern. It shall be adequately provided with fuel and kept ready for use at all times. The speed shall be at least 6 knots in smooth water when fully loaded.

"(e) The searchlight for use on motor lifeboats shall be of rugged construction and suitable for operation under adverse weather conditions. It shall be so constructed as to project a beam of light at least 200 yards and at that distance effectively illuminate a light-colored object over a width of 60 feet. The source of power shall be of sufficient capacity to operate the light continuously for a period of 3 hours.

"(f) The radiotelegraph installation shall be of a type capable of transmitting clearly perceptible audible signals between lifeboat and vessel on the international calling and distress frequency, and a radio receiving equipment capable of satisfactorily receiving such signals. The power supply shall be capable of operating this equipment for a continuous period of at least 6 hours.

"(g) The power supply for the searchlight and radio installation above provided for shall be derived from one source, the capacity of which shall be ample to operate both such appliances simultaneously.

"Equipment for life rafts

"SEC. 923. Life rafts shall be equipped as follows:

"(a) Distress signals: One watertight metal case containing 12 self-igniting red lights.

"(b) Matches: One box of friction matches in a watertight container.

"(c) Oars: Four oars.

"(d) Painter: One painter.

"(e) Provisions: One airtight receptacle containing 2 pounds of provisions for each person.

"(f) Rowlocks: Five rowlocks.

"(g) Sea anchor: One sea anchor.

"(h Self-igniting water light: One self-igniting water light.

"(i) Storm oil: One container holding 1 gallon of vegetable or animal oil so constructed that the oil can be easily distributed on the water, and so arranged that it can be attached to the sea anchor.

"(j) Water: One watertight receptacle containing 1 quart of fresh water for each person and proper means provided for withdrawing the water. (Vessels navigating on fresh water only exempt from this requirement.)

"SEC. 924. Lifeboats and life rafts carried on vessels other than those in groups 1 and 2 shall be provided with such items of the equipment listed in sections 922 and 923 as the Bureau finds to be necessary.

"Embarkation aids

"SEC. 925. (a) Suitable arrangements shall be made for embarking the passengers in the boats at an embarkation deck. Wherever practicable the embarkation deck shall be a different deck from the boat deck. A suitable ladder shall be provided for each set of davits to enable passengers to descend to the lifeboats and life rafts. The ladder shall be of sufficient length to reach the water line with the ship at her lightest seagoing draft and listed 15° either way. The ladder shall be stowed at the embarkation deck or, on large ships, at positions below such deck where the use of the ladders is practicable. They shall be stowed and secured in such manner as to be ready and convenient for immediate use. On ships where no embarkation deck is provided, ladders shall be stowed in a similar manner on the boat deck. They shall be reversible and free from garment-entangling projections.

"(b) Provision shall be made for an electric or other system of lighting sufficient for all requirements of safety in abandoning ship, and particularly upon the decks on which the lifeboats are stowed. Provisions shall be made on all passenger vessels, where the boat deck is more than 30 feet above the water line at the lightest seagoing draft, for ready and continuous illumination over the sides of the vessel, so that the lifeboats when alongside and in process of or immediately after being launched can be handled safely. This illumination shall be supplied by the emergency lighting system provided for in sections 818 to 822, inclusive.

"(c) The falls of the lifeboats attached to the davits shall be ready for service at all times, and means shall be provided for speedily detaching each boat from the falls serving it. It shall not be necessary that the apparatus detach both lower fall blocks simultaneously.

"Life preservers

"SEC. 926. (a) All vessels shall be provided with one approved life preserver for each person carried. In passenger vessels where the life preservers are not suitable for both adults and children, there shall be provided an additional number suitable for children equal to at least 10 percent of the total number of passengers the ship is certified to carry. The foregoing life preservers are required in addition to those carried as lifeboat equipment.

"(b) All life preservers, after having been submerged about 2 inches below the surface for a period of 48 hours, shall be capable of sustaining in fresh water a net weight of at least 16½ pounds when intended for adult use and 11 pounds when intended for children. Life preservers which depend for buoyancy on rushes, cork shavings, granulated cork, kapok, or any other loose granulated material, or on air compartments which require inflation, are prohibited.

"(c) All life preservers shall be so placed as to be readily accessible to the persons on board; their position shall be plainly indicated so as to be known to the persons concerned.

"Life buoys, water lights, and line-throwing guns

"SEC. 927. (a) The minimum number of ring life buoys to be carried on passenger vessels of groups 1 and 2 and the minimum number to which a water light shall be attached is fixed by the following table:

Length of vessel	Minimum number of buoys	Minimum number of buoys to which water lights shall be attached
Under 200 feet	8	6
200 and under 400 feet	12	6
400 and under 600 feet	18	9
600 and under 800 feet	24	12
800 feet and over	30	15

"All ring life buoys shall be fitted with beckets securely seized. One of the ring life buoys on each side of a vessel shall have a line attached at least 15 fathoms in length.

"(b) Passenger vessels of groups 3, 4, and 5, and all other vessels, shall carry one-half the number of ring life buoys required by the above table, but the number to which water lights must be attached shall be prescribed by the Bureau.

"(c) All life buoys and water lights shall be distributed and secured as follows:

"(1) All ring life buoys shall be so placed as to be readily accessible to the persons on board, and their positions plainly indicated so as to be known to the persons concerned.

"(2) The ring life buoys shall always be capable of being rapidly cast loose and shall not be permanently secured in any way.

"(d) Life buoys shall be capable of sustaining in fresh water for a continuous period of 24 hours a net weight of 32 pounds. The required buoyancy may be supplied by solid cork or any other equivalent material, but no life buoy shall be approved which is filled with rushes, cork shavings, granulated cork, kapok, or any other loose granulated material, or whose buoyancy depends upon air compartments which require inflation.

"(e) Vessels of groups 1 and 2 and all other vessels over 150 gross tons, navigating the ocean on unprotected waters, shall be provided with a suitable line-throwing gun, together with projectiles and other auxiliary apparatus thereto, in such number and of such type, construction, and character as may be prescribed by the Bureau.

"PART 2. SPECIAL APPLIANCES

"Requirements for preventing collisions

"SEC. 931. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover in detail such requirements as are necessary to insure that each vessel complies with the statutes for safe navigation and the prevention of collisions which apply in each case. The Bureau shall determine in each case the size and location of all required lights, such as side lights, masthead lights, range lights, stern lights, towing lights, anchor lights, not under command lights, and such other lights as the statutes may require. In the same manner, the Bureau shall determine the size and location of such equipment as whistles (or equivalent sound devices), fog horns (where required), fog bells, and such signal shapes as are required. The Bureau shall prescribe minimum requirements as to the construction and performance of all these articles of equipment and may require any or all such equipment to be tested in such a manner as in its judgment will demonstrate the suitability of the equipment.

"Compasses

"SEC. 932. (a) The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the detailed requirements for compasses and shall prescribe the size, location, and method of installation to fit the various ships and services. Each vessel shall be equipped with one or more magnetic compasses, as the type of ship and the nature of the service may make necessary, which shall be adjusted and the deviation tables verified, from time to time, to the Bureau's satisfaction. The Bureau may exempt from this requirement any vessel on which a compass would be neither necessary nor useful.

"(b) Passenger vessels of group 1 shall be equipped with a master gyroscopic compass, together with the necessary repeaters for such purposes as steering, taking bearings and azimuths, and for radio direction finding. The Bureau shall apply this requirement to passenger vessels in other groups when it considers the nature of the service or the number of passengers carried makes it desirable and necessary.

"SEC. 933. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover all requirements as to number, size, and methods of handling, for anchors and anchor cables. Each passenger vessel shall be equipped with anchors of such number and weight and cables of such size as to insure her safety when anchored and shall be provided with proper means for handling the anchors and gear with promptitude and safety. The Bureau may exempt from this requirement any vessel on which anchors would be neither necessary nor useful.

"SEC. 935. All vessels shall be provided with means suitable for finding the depth of water. In addition to the ordinary lead lines, passenger vessels over 500 gross tons in groups 1 and 2, and other mechanically propelled vessels over 500 gross tons in groups 1 and 2, shall be equipped with an efficient mechanical deep-sea sounding machine. Passenger vessels over 2,000 gross tons in groups 1, 2, and 3, and other vessels over 5,000 gross tons in groups 1 and 2 shall, in addition, be equipped with an efficient echo depth-finding apparatus. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall require that all of the apparatus required by this section be of a suitable type, properly located, properly installed, and that it is at all times in condition for use.

"SEC. 936. Each vessel in groups 1 and 2 shall be provided with a towing hawser suitable for the size and type of vessel. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall prescribe the size, material, and length of hawser which will satisfactorily comply with this requirement.

"PART 3. COMMUNICATIONS

"SEC. 941. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the various types of distress signals required by statute and shall prescribe the number and type of each to be carried on vessels of all groups. The Bureau shall conduct such tests as may be necessary to determine the suitability of all such signals for the purpose and, by inspection and test, determine that those carried by the vessels are in condition to function properly in an emergency.

"SEC. 942. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the various types of signaling lamps necessary for proper communication by the International Morse Code. Each passenger vessel in groups 1, 2, and 3, and cargo vessels of more than 1,000 gross tons in groups 1, 2, and 3, shall be equipped with an efficient signaling lamp, as approved by the Bureau, and the Bureau shall apply this requirement to other vessels when it finds it necessary.

"SEC. 943. All passenger vessels in groups 1 and 2, and all cargo vessels of more than 1,000 gross tons in groups 1 and 2, shall be equipped with a set of international signal flags, and in addition the flags of her own international call letters. Each vessel required to be equipped with these signal flags shall also be provided with a substantially bound copy of the International Signal Book. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall cover the size of flags required by the various types of ships and shall require that proper means be provided, in each case, for the hoisting of the signals where they can be readily seen and understood. The Bureau shall apply these requirements to other vessels when it finds it necessary and may exempt any vessel on which the signal flags would be neither necessary nor useful.

"SEC. 944. Each passenger vessel in groups 1, 2, and 3, over 500 gross tons shall be equipped with a satisfactory searchlight. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall prescribe the size, type, range, and location of the searchlight in each case.

"SEC. 945. Each vessel shall be equipped with interior communications for the proper operation of the ship, such as voice tubes, telephones, engine and steering telegraphs, rudder angle indicators, revolution indicators, and such others as may be necessary. The Bureau's rules and regulations shall set forth the general requirements for this type of equipment and shall determine in each case what is required for the proper operation of the ship.

"SEC. 946. When the nature of the service demands it, and the sending stations are available on the route, the Bureau may require any passenger vessel to be equipped with means for finding her bearing and distance from a sending station, in fog or thick weather, by the use of synchronous radio and submarine sound signals or other equally effective apparatus.

"TITLE X. OPERATION OF SHIPS

"PART 1. DUTIES OF OWNERS

"SEC. 1001. (a) The owner of each vessel shall be responsible for insuring that the crew is fully trained to meet all emergencies that may come to pass and shall give particular attention to the drills necessary to insure proper training in the duties necessary to meet emergencies due to fire, collision, and stranding.

"(b) The owner of each passenger vessel in group 1 shall be responsible for seeing that the passengers are properly instructed as to the procedure in case of an emergency. To this end a drill shall be held, as soon after departure from port as possible, during which the passengers shall be fully instructed. This instruction to include the proper method of wearing life preservers, the nearest route by which they may reach the embarkation deck, the boat to which they are assigned for abandon ship, and such other information as is necessary. The time of holding such drills and their duration shall be entered in the ship's log. Failure to comply with the requirements of this paragraph shall subject the owner to a civil penalty of $10,000 which may be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary of Commerce in accordance with such proceedings as the Secretary shall by regulations prescribe.

"Station bills

"SEC. 1002. (a) Station bills shall be prepared and posted in several parts of the vessel, and, in particular, in all spaces occupied by the crew. These station bills shall show the normal station and duty of each member of the crew, his special duties in all emergency conditions and his duties when it is necessary to abandon ship.

"(b) Signals: The station bill shall show in detail the various signals to be used, first, to arouse the crew and to designate the type of emergency; and second, to arouse the passengers, if any. In addition, the station bills shall show the signals to be used at abandon ship for manning, swinging out and lowering the boats, and other lifesaving equipment.

"(c) Fire: The station bill shall show the station and duty of each member of the crew in case of fire to the end that all fire pumps are properly manned with the minimum loss of time; that the fire hoses are properly manned; that the available chemical, foam, or gas extinguishing equipment is properly manned; that the fire-screen doors are closed properly; that escapes are clear for the use of passengers and crew; that the ventilation blowers (except those for the machinery spaces) are shut down; that the emergency light and power system is manned and ready for use; that the breathing apparatus is provided and ready for use and, where passengers are carried, that all passengers are guided to the open decks or other places of safety.

"(d) Collision or stranding: The station bill shall show the station and duty of each member of the crew in case of a collision or stranding to the end that all watertight doors are manned and properly closed; that all side lights, ports, and other openings in the sides are properly closed; that the valves on all lines, which pass through the ship's side, such as sanitary and scupper lines, are properly closed; that all valves which will prevent water, from a damaged compartment, finding its way into an intact compartment are closed; that all available bilge pumps are manned and properly used; that the emergency light and power system is manned and ready for use and, where passengers are carried, that all passengers are guided to the open decks or other places of safety.

"Abandon ship: The station bill shall show the station and duty of each member of the crew in case it becomes necessary to abandon ship to the end that all lifeboats, life rafts, and other lifesaving equipment are properly manned so that they can be placed in the water with the least possible delay; that the passengers may be embarked promptly and safely; that the passengers are dressed and wear their life preservers properly and that all passengers are guided to their embarkation stations.

"Drills

"SEC. 1003. In order that the crew may become expert in all the duties covered by the station bills as set forth in section 1002, each member, when he comes on board, shall be furnished with a card or paper on which shall be set forth all of his duties as set forth in the station bills. On each passenger ship, except one on which the same crew is employed over a long period, each member of the crew shall be mustered at his various stations and instructed in his duties at each station prior to the vessel's sailing and as soon as practicable after the arrival of the crew on board.

"SEC. 1004. (a) The owner, through his representative the master, shall be responsible for holding, while at sea, weekly drills of the crew in all their emergency duties. Sufficient drills so that each member of the crew becomes expert in the duties required of him in each emergency condition set forth in section 1002 shall be held. These drills shall not be confined to the minimum required by law until it is assured that each man is fully qualified to perform his duties. These drills shall be recorded in the official log.

"(b) The owner, through his representative the master, shall give special attention to the training of the members of the crew in the use of the breathing apparatus carried so that it is assured that the required number of men may remain at their stations in the machinery spaces and that the men detailed to fight a fire can approach the scene of the fire without danger from smoke or gas.

"PART 2. INSPECTIONS

"SEC. 1011. In conducting the inspections of passenger ships of groups 1 and 2, as required by section 602 (d) and (e) of this act, the Bureau's inspectors shall assure themselves first, that the crew is properly stationed and instructed as required by this title; second, that the station bills are in proper form and posted and lighted in such a manner that they can be read without difficulty; and third, that each member of the crew has been furnished with full information as to his duties in an emergency as set forth in section 1003.

"Drills before departure

"SEC. 1012. (a) Fires: The Bureau's inspectors shall conduct a fire drill and shall assure themselves that the members of the crew who perform the various duties are the ones assigned to those duties by the station bills. The Bureau's inspectors shall see that the full fire pump capacity is utilized; that the proper number of fire hoses are in use; that the proper chemical, foam, or gas extinguishing equipment is manned and ready for use; that all fire-screen doors close automatically and are properly attended; that the esacpes from all spaces are clear; that the proper ventilation blowers are shut down; that the emergency light and power system is attended and tested; that the breathing apparatus is in proper working condition and that the proper members of the crew are instructed in its use; and that the members of the crew, assigned to guide the passengers, are at their stations and fully instructed in their duties.

"(b) Collision or stranding: The Bureau's inspectors shall conduct a collision drill and shall assure themselves that the members of the crew who perform the various duties are the ones assigned to those duties by the station bills. The Bureau's inspectors shall see that all power operated watertight doors close promptly when the bridge control is used; that all other watertight doors are closed and attended; that all side lights, ports, and other openings in the sides are properly closed and attended; that the valves on all lines which pass through the ship's sides below the bulkhead deck, such as sanitary and scupper lines, are properly attended and that they can be closed; that all valves which will prevent water from a damaged compartment finding its way into an intact compartment are properly attended and that they can be closed; that the emergency light and power system is attended and in operation; that all available bilge pumps, particularly the submersible bilge pumps, are manned and that the crew is properly instructed in the operation of the necessary valves, from above the bulkhead deck, to make possible the pumping out of the various compartments; and that the crew, assigned to guide passengers, are at their stations and fully instructed in their duties.

"(c) Abandon ship: The Bureau's inspectors shall conduct an abandon-ship drill and shall assure themselves that all the lifeboats, life rafts, and similar apparatus are properly equipped; that all lifeboats, life rafts, and similar apparatus can be placed in the water when all the ship's power is shut off; that a sufficient number of lifeboats are lowered to demonstrate the skill of the crew and the satisfactoriness of the handling gear; that the lifeboats lowered are handled and manned by the members of the crew assigned to them; that all other lifeboats are attended by the members of the crew assigned to them; that it is possible and practicable to embark the passengers in the lifeboats at the embarkation stations and that the members of the crew assigned to guide and assist the passengers are fully instructed in their duties.

"Compliance

"SEC. 1013. The Bureau's inspectors shall not permit any passenger vessel in groups 1 and 2 to depart from any United States port if it fails to comply in any respect with the requirements of this title. A reinspection may be held, but not sooner than 24 hours after the last one on which the vessel failed to comply.

"TITLE XI. SAFETY CERTIFICATES

"SEC. 1101. All vessels of the United States complying with the requirements of this act and any law or convention requiring radio equipment, shall be issued a safety certificate. Such certificate shall show in detail the requirements necessary for each particular vessel and that such requirements have been met.

"SEC. 1102. (a) Safety certificates: The Bureau, after the proper inspections have been made, shall issue a safety certificate to each passenger vessel in groups 1, 2, and 3. These safety certificates shall follow the form prescribed in the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, in force, and, for vessels engaged in international voyages, the certificates shall bear the heading prescribed by the convention. The certificates shall include the following information:

"(1) The kind of voyage for which the certificate is granted.

"(2) The name, distinguishing number or letters, port of registry or enrollment, and gross tonnage.

"(3) That the vessel has been properly inspected in accordance with the requirements of this act.

"(4) That the inspection showed that the vessel complied with the requirements of this act so far as the hull, main, and auxiliary machinery and all boilers are concerned and especially the details of the watertight subdivision arrangements, the stability conditions, the protection against fire and other details having to do with the safety of the ship as a whole.

"(5) The subdivision load line (or lines) assigned and the exact conditions under which it is to apply.

"(6) That the lifeboats, life rafts, and other lifesaving appliances comply with the requirements of this act and shall give the maximum number of persons this equipment permits having on board.

"(7) That the radiotelegraph installation is satisfactory and in accordance with law. The information shall be at least as complete as that required by the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea, in force.

"(8) That, in all other respects, the vessel complies with the requirements of this act.

"(b) The safety certificate shall be dated and shall be signed by the Chief of the Bureau, or, in his absence, by his next assistant.

"(c) A similar safety certificate shall be issued, under the same conditions, to any passenger vessel in group 4 or group 5 which engages in an international voyage as defined by the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea in force.

"SEC. 1103. Safety radiotelegraphy certificate: A safety radiotelegraphy certificate shall be issued by the Bureau to each cargo vessel of the United States of 1,600 gross tons and over, which complies with the requirements of the radio provisions of the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea in force and any act requiring the vessel to be equipped with radio apparatus.

"SEC. 1104. Exemption certificate: The Bureau may issue an exemption certificate to any ship to which an exemption is granted in accordance with any of the provisions of this act, of the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea in force or any act requiring the vessel to be equipped with radio apparatus. No exemption from any of the requirements of the Federal Communications Commission respecting radio equipment shall be issued without first receiving from the Commission the necessary authority.

"SEC. 1105. All entries in the certificates, required by sections 1102, 1103, and 1104 of this act, regarding radio equipments and installations shall be as prescribed and determined by the Federal Communications Commission in accordance with law, treaty, or convention.

"SEC. 1106. None of the certificates covered by this title shall be issued for a period of more than 12 months. In the case of vessels which are engaged on international voyages, as defined in the Convention, the certificates may be extended under the necessities and conditions set forth in the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea in force.

"SEC. 1107. Nothing in this title shall be construed as lessening in any degree the control of the Federal Communications Commission over any matters connected with the radio equipment and its operation on shipboard; and its decision, or determination, in regard to the radio requirements and installation, or exemptions, shall be final, subject only to review in accordance with law.

"SEC. 1108. It shall be the duty of the owner to have the inspections made as a prerequisite to the issuance of a "safety certificate" or a "safety radiotelegraphy certificate", as the case may be, and no vessel shall be used unless there is on board and in force a proper certificate or certificates required by this title.

"TITLE XII. ORGANIZATION OF THE BUREAU OF MARINE INSPECTION AND NAVIGATION

"PART I. DUTIES

"SEC. 1201. (a) The Bureau shall enforce the requirements of this act, and all laws or parts of laws not repealed by this act which have heretofore been required to be enforced by the Bureau. Among its other duties, the Bureau shall:

"(1) Issue rules, as prescribed in this act, for the design, construction, inspection, and operation of all merchant vessels of the United States, such as to ensure the maximum safety of the ship and of the passengers and crew.

"(2) Decide upon, in accordance with the requirements of this act, in the case of all merchant vessels already built, which in the future may be built, or which may be entered for United States registry from any other source for operation under the United States flag, all questions concerning structural strength, loading, watertight subdivision, stability under all conditions, fire-resisting qualities, fire-detecting equipment, fire-fighting equipment, life-saving equipment, equipment for communications other than radio, electrical equipment, navigational equipment, bilge and fire pumps, propelling machinery, ground tackle, and all other features which may be necessary to ensure that the vessels are fully and properly constructed and equipped and safe for operation in their trades.

"(3) Inspect each vessel, as set forth in title VI, part II, of this act, together with all its machinery and appurtenances at the time of her building, or, in the case of a vessel built abroad, at the time of her entry for United States registry, to insure that it complies with all the technical requirements for design, material, and workmanship, and to inspect each existing vessel as frequently as necessary, but at least once each year, to insure that she is maintained in proper condition to warrant her continuance in her trade.

"(4) Determine upon and fix the gross tonnage and the net register tonnage of each vessel and perform all necessary duties in connection with the admeasurement and readmeasurement of all vessels.

"(5) Assign subdivision load lines for all new passenger vessels and for all existing passenger vessels in groups 1 and 2, and loaded drafts for all other vessels of the United States.

"(6) Study the reports of all disasters and accidents to determine the failure of material involved, to promulgate to all in the service the results of these investigations, and to keep complete records of all data that can be obtained bearing on such disasters and accidents.

"(7) Enforce all laws relating to the efficiency and discipline of licensed officers and seamen and the employment and discharge of seamen, the licensing of officers, the certification of seamen, and the issuance of continuous discharge books.

"(8) Prepare, compile, and publish statistical and other data concerning the merchant marine, licensed officers, and seamen, including navigation laws and list of merchant vessels.

"(b) To carry out the duties set forth in this section the Bureau shall be reorganized in accordance with part II of this title.

"PART II. ORGANIZATION

"SEC. 1202. From 90 days after the date of enactment of this act, the following positions as now constituted by or pursuant to law in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation in the Department of Commerce are abolished, except as provided in section 1206: Director or Chief of Bureau, Assistant Director, supervising inspector, principal traveling inspector, inspector of hulls, assistant inspector of hulls, inspector of boilers, assistant inspector of boilers, shipping commissioner, deputy shipping commissioner, and local manager.

"SEC. 1203. (a) From 90 days after the enactment of this act there shall be in the regular establishment of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation in the Department of Commerce not to exceed 600 commissioned officers who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be distributed in grades proportioned as follows: 1 director, 3 assistant directors, 10 supervising inspectors, 8 assistant supervising inspectors, 20 traveling inspectors, 66 inspectors of hulls, 163 assistant inspectors of hulls, 66 inspectors engineering, 163 assistant inspectors engineering, 20 shipping commissioners, 30 deputy shipping commissioners, and 50 assistant deputy shipping commissioners: Provided, That the numbers herein prescribed in the grades of inspectors of hulls, assistant inspectors of hulls, inspectors engineering, assistant inspectors engineering, deputy shipping commissioners, and assistant deputy shipping commissioners shall be the limiting numbers in those respective grades, and only so many shall be appointed to the respective grades as the exigencies of the service shall require.

"(b) All provisions of law applicable to, and the rights, privileges, and duties of, the Director (or Chief of Bureau), supervising inspectors, principal traveling inspectors, local inspectors of hulls, assistant inspectors of hulls, local inspectors of boilers, assistant inspectors of boilers, shipping commissioners, and deputy shipping commissioners, respectively, in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, shall be applicable in like manner to and shall be the rights, privileges, and duties of the Director, supervising inspectors, traveling inspectors, inspectors of hulls, assistant inspectors of hulls, inspectors engineering, assistant inspectors engineering, shipping commissioners, and deputy shipping commissioners, respectively, appointed under this section.

"(c) The Director shall direct all the activities of the Bureau and shall be responsible for the conservation and expenditure of funds appropriated for or allotted to the Bureau and shall certify the accounts of the Bureau to the General Accounting Office. There shall be in the Bureau a Matériel Division, a Personnel Division, and an Administrative Division. At the head of each division there shall be an Assistant Director, who shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Director or required by law. In the absence of the Director the duties of that officer shall be performed by an Assistant Director in the order of seniority, or, if all have the same seniority, then according to the following order of precedence: First, the head of the Matériel Division; second, the head of the Personnel Division; third, the head of the Administrative Division. Three of the supervising inspectors appointed under this section shall be members of the planning board provided for in section 1205, and the other supervising inspectors shall be in the field service of the Bureau. The assistant supervising inspectors appointed under this section shall perform such of the duties of supervising inspectors and under such circumstances and conditions as the Director, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall prescribe by regulations. The deputy shipping commissioners and assistant deputy shipping commissioners appointed under this section shall perform such of the duties of shipping commissioners and under such circumstances and conditions as the Director, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall prescribe by regulation. Any officer appointed under this section may, when so ordered by the Director of the Bureau, be permanently or temporarily assigned to the performance of duties prescribed for any other officer so appointed without additional compensation. When any officer appointed under this section is performing the duties prescribed for another officer, all laws applicable to such other officer shall apply to the officer performing such duties.

"(d) There shall be under the Assistant Director in charge of the Matériel Division of the Bureau in the District of Columbia a technical section, consisting of a technical staff, the members of which shall have the necessary background of education and experience to permit them to render correct judgment on all matters, of whatever nature, having to do with the design and construction of ships. The senior members of the technical staff shall be selected for their special expertness in naval architecture, marine engineering, and electrical engineering, without regard to civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. These senior members shall consist of a senior naval architect at a salary not to exceed $7,000 per annum, a senior engineer at a salary not to exceed $7,000 per annum, and an electrical engineer at a salary not to exceed $6,000 per annum, the junior members of the staff to be selected in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The services of this permanent staff may be augmented by the part-time employment of technical experts in special fields as may be found necessary to keep up with the advance in the art of shipbuilding. The duties of the technical section shall be to advise the Director upon all matters of design connected with merchant vessels to be built and merchant vessels to be reconditioned or repaired, so that all the requirements of this act are properly met so far as design is concerned, and to control the admeasurement of merchant vessels and the maximum loaded drafts for them.

"(e) No person interested, either directly or indirectly, in any patented article required to be used on any vessel by this act or by any existing law, or who is a member of any association of owners, masters, engineers, pilots, or seamen of vessels, or who is directly or indirectly pecuniarily interested in any vessel, shall be eligible for appointment to any position established under this section.

"SEC. 1204. In addition to the officers appointed, and the technical section prescribed under the preceding section, there shall be in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, under each Assistant Director, such other sections as required by good administration and such other officers and employees as are or may be authorized by law.

"Planning board

"SEC. 1205. There shall be in the Bureau in the District of Columbia a planning board, which shall be composed of three supervising inspectors, designated by the Director, who shall be assigned to the service of the Bureau in the District of Columbia, and one commissioned officer of the Navy, not below the rank of lieutenant commander, to be assigned by the Secretary of the Navy, and one commissioned officer of the Coast Guard, not below the rank of lieutenant commander, to be assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as members of such board without additional compensation. The planning board shall perform the duties of planning and such other duties as may be assigned by the Director.

"PART III. APPOINTMENT

"SEC. 1206. (a) Any present incumbent of a position abolished by section 1202, or a position corresponding to senior naval architect, senior engineer, or electrical engineer may be appointed to a corresponding or lower grade under section 1203 without examination, and to a higher grade after passing such mental examination as the Director, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall prescribe. Until the expiration of 60 days after the effective date of sections 1202 and 1203, vacancies in the grades of traveling inspector and above, and vacancies in the grade of shipping commissioner, and vacancies in the position of senior naval architect, senior engineer, or electrical engineer, as established under section 1203, may be filled by the appointment of any person not over 50 years of age with no previous service in the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection or the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and any person thus appointed shall be required to pass such examination as the Secretary of Commerce may require, to establish his mental, moral, and professional fitness, and shall be required to pass a physical examination before a board of three officers of the Public Health Service.

"(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1202, any present incumbent of a position abolished by that section who is not appointed by the President to some position herein authorized shall be entitled to his present position in the Bureau with all of the rights and benefits accruing to him in that status under the provisions of law heretofore applicable to that position, except that the Director may prescribe such changes in the duties to be performed by him as may be appropriate to provide for the effective administration of this act.

"SEC. 1207. (a) Prior to the expiration of 60 days after the effective date of section 1203, vacancies in the permanent grade of Director may be filled, and subsequent to that date shall be filled by appointment, by selection from the grades of Assistant Director or supervising inspector; and vacancies in the grades of (1) Assistant Director, (2) supervising inspector, (3) assistant supervising inspector, (4) traveling inspector, (5) inspector of hulls, (6) inspector engineering, (7) shipping commissioner, and (8) deputy shipping commissioner, respectively, prior to the expiration of 60 days after the effective date of section 1203, may be filled, and, subsequent to that date, shall be filled by appointment from the grades of (1) supervising inspector, (2) assistant supervising inspector, (3) traveling inspector, (4) local inspector of hulls or local inspector engineering, (5) assistant inspector of hulls, (6) assistant inspector engineering, (7) deputy shipping commissioner, and (8) assistant deputy shipping commissioner, respectively, under such regulations as the Director, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall prescribe. Vacancies in the grades assistant inspector of hulls, assistant inspector engineering, and assistant deputy shipping commissioner shall be filled by appointments, to the bottom of the lists in the respective grades, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of citizens of the United States not over 35 years of age on the date of their examinations, who have passed such physical, mental, professional, and character examinations as the Director, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall prescribe.

"(b) The Secretary of Commerce shall give public notice of examinations to be held for determining eligibility for original appointment as assistant inspector of hulls, assistant inspector engineering, and assistant deputy shipping commissioner under this act. Such notice shall be given at least 60 days prior to the date of the examination, and shall set forth the time and places of the examination, the method of application for it, and the scope of the mental and physical requirements to be met. The examination questions shall be prepared by the Personnel Division in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and shall be sent to the persons designated by the Director to hold the examinations. After an examination has been held the examination papers shall be returned to the Personnel Division to be marked and graded by it, and the papers so marked and graded shall be open to public inspection under such regulations as the Director may prescribe. The persons who pass any such examination shall be placed on an eligible list in the order of the grades made on the examination. Any appointment to a position for which such examination was held shall be made from the three highest persons remaining on such list at the time of appointment and shall be made within 1 year from the date of examination.

"(c) No person shall be eligible for appointment as an assistant deputy shipping commissioner who has not served at least 3 years as a licensed officer on ocean-going vessels. No person shall be eligible for appointment as an assistant inspector of hulls who has not served at least 3 years as a licensed officer on ocean-going vessels or had at least 3 years' experience in the construction and repair of vessels.

"(d) No person shall be appointed under this act as an assistant inspector of hulls who is not by experience and technical education well versed in all the details of shipbuilding or ship operation. After the passage of this act, all men appointed to this position shall have gained their experience in building and repairing ships in shipyards until at least 50 percent of the assistant inspectors of hulls have had this background. Thereafter the ratio of one-half licensed officers who, in addition to their knowledge and experience gained at sea, have the necessary knowledge and experience to compete in the examinations, and one-half those who have gained their experience in shipyards shall be maintained as nearly as practicable.

"(e) No person shall be appointed under this act as an assistant inspector engineering who is not by experience and technical education well versed in all the details of building ship machinery or operating ship machinery. After the passage of this act all of the men appointed to this position shall have gained their experience in building and repairing ship machinery in shipyards until at least 50 percent of the assistant inspectors engineering have had this background; and at least one-quarter of those thus appointed shall be well qualified in the installation, repair, and operation of all electrical wiring and appliances used aboard modern ships. Thereafter the ratio of one-half licensed engineers who, in addition to their knowledge and experience gained at sea, have the necessary knowledge and experience to compete in the examinations, and one-half those who have gained their experience in shipyards shall be maintained as nearly as practicable.

"SEC. 1208. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to detail one commissioned officer of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to detail one commissioned officer of the Coast Guard, to the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation in the Department of Commerce for the purpose of this act; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to detail one commissioned officer of the Public Health Service to the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation to act as medical aide to the Director of that Bureau. When so detailed, such officers shall be paid from the regular appropriations for their respective departments, but when required to travel the expense therefor shall be paid from the appropriation for the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation under the regulations prescribed for other officers of that Bureau.

"SEC. 1209. A Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, appointed under this act, shall be appointed for a term of 4 years, and may be reappointed in like manner for one further period of 4 years. Upon the completion of duty as Director, he may be appointed as an Assistant Director or a supervising inspector, and he shall be an additional number in the grade in which so appointed. When a Director is appointed from the grade of Assistant Director or the grade of supervising inspector such appointment shall create a vacancy in the grade from which appointed.

"SEC. 1210. The Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall cause each commissioned officer on the active list of the Bureau to be physically examined at least once each calendar year by a board of officers of the United States Public Health Service, and a record shall be kept of the physical condition thus found. Any officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation found physically disqualified for further duty by reason of disease or injury due to vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct on his part, shall, upon approval of the Secretary of Commerce and by the President, be dismissed from the service.

"PART IV. PAY

"SEC. 1211. The annual base pay of commissioned officers of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation appointed under section 1203 shall be: Director, $8,000; Assistant Director, $6,500; supervising inspector, $6,000; assistant supervising inspector, $4,200; traveling inspector, $4,000; inspector of hulls, $3,500; assistant inspector of hulls, $3,000; inspector, engineering, $3,500; assistant inspector, engineering, $3,000; shipping commissioner, $4,200; deputy shipping commissioner, $3,500; assistant deputy shipping commissioner, $3,000. In addition to the annual base pay hereby established, there shall be included in the annual compensation of each such officer an additional 2½ percent of the annual base pay of the grade in which such officer is serving for each 3 years of service by such officer in any or all grades and positions in the Bureau of Navigation, the Steamboat Inspection Service, the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, and the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation: Provided, That the total pay, including increases of any officer in any grade, shall not exceed 125 percent of the base pay of officers in his grade: Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall operate to reduce the pay of any person serving in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

"Retirement

"SEC. 1212. Any commissioned officer in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation appointed under section 1203 who is found upon physical examination by a board of officers of the Public Health Service to be disqualified for efficient and useful service, by reason of disease or injury not due to vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct, and upon the approval of the findings of the board by the Secretary of Commerce shall be retired on an annuity; and all officers so appointed shall, upon reaching the age of 65 years, be compulsorily retired from further performance of duty. The annual compensation of persons retired under this section shall be a sum equal to 50 percent of the base pay and increases to which the officer was entitled at the time of his retirement from active service in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation: Provided, That in computing such retirement pay no amount shall be included on account of subsistence or travel.

"SEC. 1212. (a) Any commissioned officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation appointed under section 1203 who has completed 30 years' service in the Bureau of Navigation, the Steamboat Inspection Service, the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, or the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, including all service in each of them, may, upon his own application, approved by the Secretary of Commerce, be retired from active service on the same annuity as if he had been retired for physical disability as set forth in section 1112 of this act: Provided, That any such officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation retired for age, for physical disability, or for 30 years' service may, in an emergency declared by the President to exist, be called back to active duty, and he shall receive active-duty pay while so serving. Upon the conclusion of the emergency, the officer so assigned to active duty shall be returned to the retired list: Provided further, That any time served when called back to active duty shall be added to previous service in computing retired pay.

"(b) Any retirement pay received by any person under this act shall be in lieu of any retirement compensation to which he may be entitled under any other act of Congress. Any moneys or deposits now held in the civil-service retirement and disability fund to the credit of any persons who may be appointed by the President to an office in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation under section 1203 shall be transferred to the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, to be applied, until expended, by that Bureau to the payment of any retirement annuities for commissioned officers payable under this title.

"PART V. REGISTER

"SEC. 1214. The Secretary of Commerce shall establish a register of the officers of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation appointed under section 1203 and shall annually, on July 1, publish a new register or amendments to the old. The register shall set forth names, dates of appointments, stations, and other pertinent information concerning such officers.

"Discipline

"SEC. 1215. (a) Whenever allegations are made against the conduct of an officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation appointed under section 1203, or against his manner of performing duty, the Secretary of Commerce shall cause an investigation to be made of the allegations; and if the circumstances warrant, the Secretary of Commerce shall cause written charges to be preferred against the accused officer; and these charges shall be heard by a board of three commissioned officers of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, senior in grade to the accused, at which hearing the officer shall be accorded all of the rights of an accused person. The Board shall be sworn to perform its duties fully and impartially, the oath to be administered in the presence of the accused, to the president of the board by the junior member, and to the other two members by the president of the board. Testimony taken before such a board shall be under oath administered to the witness by the president of the board. Allegations of the following offenses shall be heard before such a board: Conduct unbecoming an officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation; disobedience of or refusal to obey a lawful order; failure in the performance of duty or neglect of duty; unauthorized absence from duty. For an offense found proved, the board shall recommend the following penalties: Conduct unbecoming an officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation—dismissal, or one of the lesser degrees of punishment herein prescribed; disobedience of or refusal to obey a lawful order—dismissal or one of the lesser degrees of punishment herein prescribed; failure in performance of duty or neglect of duty—demotion to the next lower grade and pay, or suspension from duty on half pay for a period not to exceed 6 months, or official reprimand; unauthorized absence from duty—suspension from duty on half pay for a period not to exceed 6 months or official reprimand: Provided, That when charges are to be heard against the Director or an Assistant Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, they shall be heard before a board of three officers of the Department of Commerce designated by the Secretary of Commerce.

"(b) When the recommendations of a board constituted under this section are approved by the Secretary of Commerce, the penalty imposed shall be carried into effect: Provided, That no officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation commissioned by the President, shall be dismissed without the approval of the President: Provided further, That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized, upon reviewing a case, to mitigate or remit any of the penalties herein prescribed whenever, in his judgment, the facts and circumstances warrant. Any action taken pursuant to this section shall not be a bar to trial of the accused person by any competent court of law or equity in a cause growing out of the same facts.

"(c) For the purpose of this section the precedence of officers shall be: Inspection branch—Director, Assistant Directors, supervising inspectors, assistant supervising inspectors, traveling inspectors, inspectors of hulls, inspectors engineering, assistant inspectors of hulls, assistant inspectors engineering; shipping branch—shipping commissioners, deputy shipping commissioners, assistant deputy shipping commissioners. When serving together on boards, shipping commissioners shall have precedence with traveling inspectors, deputy shipping commissioners with inspectors of hulls and inspectors engineering, and assistant deputy shipping commissioners with assistant inspectors of hulls and assistant inspectors engineering, according to length of service in grade.

"PART VI. CHANGE OF STATION

"SEC. 1216. The Director of the Bureau is authorized to change the permanent station of any officer in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation whenever the exigencies of the service require. When such changes are ordered the officer permanently changing station shall be entitled to reimbursement for actual necessary traveling expenses for himself and his dependents and to allowances for packing, carting, crating, and transportation of his household effects, in accordance with the laws and regulations in force at the time, applicable to officers of the Navy. For the purpose of carrying this section into effect, and for that purpose only, officers of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall be entitled to the following allowances: Director—allowance of the Chief of Bureau of the Navy; Assistant Director—allowance of a captain in the Navy; supervising inspector—allowance of a commander in the Navy; assistant supervising inspector, traveling inspector, or shipping commissioner—allowance of a lieutenant commander in the Navy; inspector of hulls, inspector engineering, or deputy shipping commissioner—allowance of a lieutenant in the Navy; assistant inspector of hulls, assistant inspector engineering or assistant deputy shipping commissioner—allowance of a lieutenant, junior grade, in the Navy: Provided, That these allowances shall not be made in the case of temporary change of station.

"PART VII. INSPECTION

"SEC. 1217. In addition to any inspections now required by law, the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall cause an inspection of every office in the field service of the Bureau, including that part of the activities of a collector of customs devoted solely to performing duties for the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, to be made by one or more traveling inspectors at least once each calendar year, and more often if he deems it advisable, and a report to be made thereon to him. At such inspections all of the records, equipment, methods of procedure, and acts of personnel, shall be open to inspection. A copy of the report of the inspection shall be furnished to the officer in charge of the office inspected, who shall be permitted to comment upon the report. No inspection in the office of a collector of customs shall be made by an officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation without previous written notice to the collector, or without the presence throughout the inspection of a representative of the collector. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to abridge or limit the right of the Secretary of Commerce to cause investigations to be made of the conduct of officers or offices of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation by persons outside of that Bureau.

"PART VIII. ASSIGNMENT OF SHIPPING COMMISSIONERS

"SEC. 1218. (a) Section 4501 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 4501. The Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall assign an officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation to perform the duties of a shipping commissioner at each port of ocean, gulf, or Great Lakes navigation which, in his judgment, may require the same; and the officer so assigned shall be regarded as a shipping commissioner under this title.'

"(b) Section 4502 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is hereby repealed.

"(c) The first sentence of section 4506 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows: 'The Secretary of Commerce shall provide each shipping commissioner with an official seal of such design as may be fixed by the Secretary.'

"Leave of absence

"SEC. 1219. Each commissioned officer of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation appointed under section 1203 may be granted, under such regulations as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe, 30 days' leave of absence with full pay in each fiscal year, and sick leave with full pay for such time as may be certified by an officer of the Public Health Service to be necessary to cover absence while such officer is ill and while he is recuperating from illness: Provided, That leave of absence not taken in any year, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, be granted in the following year. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, grant additional leave of absence to such officers, but such additional leave of absence shall be without pay.

"PART IX. MISCELLANEOUS

"SEC. 1220. The Surgeon General of the Public Health Service is authorized and directed to provide under such regulations as the Surgeon General may prescribe, with the approval of the President, in marine hospital, or other contract hospitals, and in dispensaries of the Public Health Service, medical and dental treatment for commissioned officers of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation.

"SEC. 1221. (a) The Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe an identifying uniform to be worn by commissioned officers of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and an identifying badge for commissioned officers, and such other persons in the employ of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation as the Secretary of Commerce may direct.

"(b) It shall be unlawful to impersonate an officer or employee of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, or for any unauthorized person to wear the uniform or badge prescribed in this section. Anyone so offending shall be liable to a penalty of $500 or imprisonment for 6 months, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 1222. A senior naval architect, a senior engineer, or an electrical engineer appointed in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation under the provision of section 1203 (d) after 10 years of satisfactory service as senior naval architect, senior engineer, or electrical engineer in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation may be retired under the provisions of sections 1212 and 1213, in like manner as a commissioned officer, and the 10 years thus served shall be counted in computing the 30 years to be served for voluntary retirement.

"TITLE XIII. GRAIN CARGOES

"SEC. 1301. (a) As used in this section a 'grain or seed cargo' means a cargo consisting of the seeds of cereal grasses such as maize, wheat, rye, barley, oats, and rice, together with such seeds as flaxseed, cottonseed, nuts, and nut kernels, when loaded in a vessel in bulk.

"(b) The Bureau's rules and regulations covering the loading of grain or seed cargoes shall set forth all necessary precautions to be taken and the methods which shall be followed for the safe stowage of such cargoes. Before permitting a vessel to load a grain or seed cargo the Bureau's inspector shall make an inspection to ensure that the vessel is properly prepared to receive the cargo, and after the vessel is loaded the inspector shall assure himself that the cargo is properly trimmed and stowed, that proper feeders are provided, and that the vessel has the freeboard required by the Load Line Acts.

"(c) Where a grain or seed cargo is loaded on board any vessel in a port of the United States all necessary precautions shall be taken to prevent the grain or seed cargo from shifting and the vessel shall not be cleared until the Bureau's inspector has found the stowage of the cargo satisfactory.

"(d) Where all such necessary precautions have not been taken, in the case of any vessel of the United States, whether the vessel was loaded in a United States port or not, the master of the vessel, and any agent of the owner who was charged with the loading of the vessel or the sending of it to sea, shall each be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000, and the owner of the vessel shall also be liable to the same fine, unless he shows that he took all reasonable means to enforce the observance of this section and was not privy to the violation.

"(e) If, after ninety days after the approval of this Act, any foreign vessel loaded with a grain or seed cargo arrives in or attempts to leave a port of the United States, having the grain or seed cargo loaded in such a manner that the master of the vessel, if the vessel were of United States registry, would be liable to a penalty under paragraph (d), the master of that foreign vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000.

"TITLE XIV. MISCELLANEOUS

"LAWS REPEALED

"SEC. 1401. All acts or parts of acts insofar as they are inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

"EFFECTIVE DATE OF ACT

"SEC. 1402. This act shall take effect after the expiration of 90 days from the date of its enactment.

"SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

"SEC. 1403. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 1404. This act may be cited as the 'Safety at Sea Act of 1937.'"

FURTHER REPORTS

We shall make further reports in order to complete the requirements of Senate Resolution No. 7.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,
WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr.,
Subcommittee.

LXXXI——156

CHARTER OF SALE OF SHIPS BY MARITIME COMMISSION

Mr. COPELAND. I present one other matter, which is of an emergency character. The Committee on Commerce held a special session this morning to take action regarding a House bill as to which there is need of immediate action. Under the law, the United States Maritime Commission is obligated to charter or sell ships which are now being operated by the Commission. It was thought and intended by the authors of the law and by the Senate that the time within which such action could be taken by the Maritime Commission would be a year from the passage of the act. The Comptroller General has ruled, however, that voyages undertaken before that time must be completed by the 27th of June. Some of the voyages are 120 days in length. Therefore it was deemed wise to amend or modify House bill 4951, which deals with this subject. It was considered by the committee, which decided to make certain modifications as indicated.

From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 4951) to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 U. S. Stat. L. 2008–2009); and because of the emergent nature of the matter I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill, as it must go back to the House and receive approval of the Senate amendments which may be adopted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I attended the meeting of the Commerce Committee this morning when this matter was discussed. I am certain the emergency exists, and I hope no Senator will object to immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4951) to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 U. S. Stat. L. 2008–2009).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendments of the Committee on Commerce were, on page 2, line 3, before the word "preference", to insert "but the Commission shall arrange as soon as practicable to offer all such lines of vessels for charter as hereinafter provided", and in line 5, after the word "discontinued", to strike out "as soon as practicable after December 31, 1937" and insert "within 1 year after the passage of this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent private operators, under such operating agreements, commencing voyages prior to said expiration date and completing them thereafter", and on the same page, line 6, after the word "Provided", to insert "further", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 U. S. Stat. L. 2008–2009) be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 704. All vessels transferred to or otherwise acquired by the Commission in any manner may be chartered or sold by the Commission pursuant to the further provisions of this act. All vessels transferred to the Commission by this act and now being operated by private operators on lines in foreign commerce of the United States shall be temporarily operated by the Commission for its account by private operators until such time and upon such operating agreements as the Commission may deem advantageous, but the Commission shall arrange as soon as practicable to offer all such lines of vessels for charter as hereinafter provided, preference to be given to present operators, and all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under such operating agreements shall be discontinued within 1 year after the passage of this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent private operators, under such operating agreements, commencing voyages prior to said expiration date and completing them thereafter: Provided further, That nothing contained herein shall be construed as limiting or affecting the power of sale under provisions of section 705 of this act."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, do the changes proposed in the House text meet the desires of petitioners for the legislation to extend the time limit and contracts entered into?

Mr. COPELAND. I hardly suppose it answers their entire point, but it certainly carries out what they thought was the law.

Mr. WALSH. Does it remove the injustices of which they complain?

Mr. COPELAND. It does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently said: Because of the fact that the committee had no time to prepare a report on the bill which was taken up as the special order this morning concerning a change in the Merchant Marine Act, I ask that the House report may be printed in the RECORD in connection with the discussion of that particular bill.

There being no objection the report (H. Rept. 293) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4951) to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 U. S. Stat. L. 2008–2009), having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

The proposed legislation seeks to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. In that section it was provided that all vessels transferred to the United States Maritime Commission by that act and then being operated by private operators on lines in foreign commerce of the United States might be temporarily operated by the Commission for its account by private operators until such time and upon such operating agreements as the Commission might deem advantageous, but that the Commission should arrange as soon as practicable to offer all such lines of vessels for charter as thereinafter provided in said act, and that all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under such operating agreements should be discontinued within 1 year after the passage of the act.

The act was approved June 29, 1936, so that under the mandate of the above section, all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators was required to be discontinued by June 29, 1937.

By section 201 (a) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, an agency was created to be known as the United States Maritime Commission, to be composed of five persons to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President was authorized to designate the member to act as chairman of the Commission, and the Commission might elect one of its members as vice chairman. It was provided that the members of the Commission should be appointed as soon as practicable after the enactment of the act, and should continue in office as designated by the President at the time of nomination for terms of 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 years, respectively, from the date upon which they qualify and take office.

It was further provided that vacancies in the Commission, so long as there should be three members in office, should not impair the power of the Commission to execute its functions, and three of the members in office should constitute a quorum for the transaction of the business of the Commission.

Three members of the Commission now hold office by recess appointments by the President, having entered upon duty September 26, 1936. These members are Rear Admiral H. A. Wiley, appointed for 4 years; Real Admiral M. M. Taylor, for 3 years; and Mr. George Landick, Jr., for 2 years.

The duties of the Commission in respect to the disposition of its vessels are further set forth in section 705, Merchant Marine Act, 1936, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 705. As soon as practicable after the passage of this act, and continuing thereafter, the Commission shall arrange for the employment of its vessels in steamship lines on such trade routes, exclusively serving the foreign trade of the United States, as the Commission shall determine are necessary and essential for the development and maintenance of the commerce of the United States and the national defense: Provided, That such needs are not being adequately served by existing steamship lines privately owned and operated by citizens of the United States and documented under the laws of the United Staes. It shall be the policy of the Commission to encourage private operation of each essential steamship line now owned by the United States by selling such lines to citizens of the United States in the manner provided in section 7 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, and in strict accordance with the provisions of section 5 of said act, or by demising its vessels on bare-boat charter to citizens of the United States who shall agree to maintain such line or lines in the manner hereinafter provided."

On June 29, 1936, at the time of the passage of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the following lines of vessels transferred to the Commission by the provisions of that act were being operated by private operators under operating agreements for the account of the Commission: American Pioneer Line, American Republics Line, Oriole Lines, America-France Line, and American Hampton Roads Line-Yankee Line. Under the operating agreements for the operation of these lines the expenses of the voyages are paid by the Maritime Commission.

Under date of January 5, 1937, the Acting Comptroller General of the United States ruled that section 704 was mandatory that all operations of the vessels under the operating agreements should be discontinued within 1 year after the passage of the act; that the act became law on June 29, 1936; that the intent and effect of the requirement contained in section 704 was that the operation of the vessels under the operating agreements should be discontinued as soon as practicable after June 29, 1936, and in no case later than June 29, 1937.

The Acting Comptroller General advised the Maritime Commission that the funds of the Commission will not be available for payment of any expenses incurred after June 29, 1937, in connection with the operation of the vessels under such operating agreements.

The Commission concluded that as some of the vessels in the above lines are engaged in voyages that last approximately 4 months, it was necessary for the Commission, in order to terminate operations within the period prescribed, either to lay up the vessels or to offer them for sale or charter. The Government-owned lines have been offered for charter on a bare-boat charter basis for 1 year, and the bids are to be opened March 1, 1937.

The Chairman of the Commission reported:

"The Commission since its appointment has been engaged, among other things, in making a study of the steamship services, routes, and lines, in order to determine what services, routes, and lines are necessary and essential for the development and maintenance of the foreign commerce of the United States and the national defense. While the Commission has not concluded its study of the essentiality of the privately owned services, routes, and lines in the foreign commerce of the United States, it is of the opinion that it would not be advisable at this time to completely abandon the Government-owned lines and has offered them for charter on a bare-boat charter basis for a temporary period. The bids are to be opened March 1, 1937." [Italics ours.]

In offering these lines for charter, the trade routes and ports to be served by the American Republic Line, the American Pioneer Line, and the Oriole Lines are substantially the same as those heretofore served in those three lines. The service formerly offered by the America-France Line was combined with the services previously offered by the America Hampton Roads Line-Yankee Line, the combined service to be operated under the name of America Hampton Roads-Yankee-France-U. K. Line.

It is said that upon the conclusion of the temporary operation under bare-boat charters, the Commission will have doubtless determined the necessity for the further operation of the Government-owned vessels.

There was introduced on February 2, 1937, the bill H. R. 4207, which proposed to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, by striking out the words "within 1 year after the passage of this act." The bill was referred to the Maritime Commission, which reported unfavorably on that bill, and the report is hereto attached. The committee held full hearings, and concluded that relief should be afforded immediately, but that H. R. 4207 would not meet the situation. It authorized the introduction of the bill H. R. 4951 and has directed that it be reported favorably without amendment.

When the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, was passed your committee believes that it was intended that the operation of the vessels upon such operating agreements might continue for at least 1 year after the passage of the act. However, the ruling of the Acting Comptroller General operated to curtail this period for 4 months as to vessels on lines requiring 4 months on their voyages, with varying periods of curtailment as to vessels requiring a shorter period. In effect, the ruling of the Acting Comptroller General served to curtail this period of service as to all lines, for the Commission has offered the vessels on all lines for bare-boat charter upon bids to be opened on March 1, 1937.

It may be desirable that the vessels on all lines shall be offered simultaneously. If so, the language of the section as construed by the Acting Comptroller General permitted the continuance of operations for only 8 months and not 1 year.

The final disposition of these lines involves many of the same factors which exist in connection with the termination of ocean-mail contracts and the substitution therefor of operating differential subsidies, and since these vessels are now 18 years old, the final disposition involves also the question of construction differential subsidies. There are involved in the disposition of the vessels on these lines even by bare-boat charter the determination of what services, routes, and lines are necessary and essential for the development and maintenance of the foreign commerce of the United States and the national defense.

The Commission says that it has not concluded its study of the essentiality of the privately owned services, routes, and lines in the foreign commerce, and it is of the opinion that "it would not be advisable at this time to completely abandon the Government-owned lines."

It follows that being compelled, under the ruling of the Acting Comptroller General, to abandon the services or charter the vessels, the Commission wisely selected the latter course; however, in the opinion of your committee that course, under the circumstances, so far imperils services of many years, and for which large sums have been expended, that temporary relief as provided in this bill should be granted.

The proposed bill makes it mandatory upon the Commission to operate the Government-owned lines by private operators, present operators to be preferred, upon such operating agreements as the Commission may deem advantageous until December 31, 1937. Thereafter, as soon as practicable, the said lines shall be sold or chartered, provided, however, that nothing contained in the bill shall be construed as limiting or affecting the power of sale under provisions of section 705 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, quoted elsewhere in this report.

This bill would extend the time for operation about 6 months longer than was permitted in the original bill, but the time in the original bill was curtailed by the ruling of the Acting Comptroller General. In addition the 1-year period was further complicated by the seamen's strike. This bill would permit flexibility in disposing of the lines as it does not require discontinuance by a stated time, but requires that it shall be as soon as practicable after December 31, 1937. This should enable the Commission to determine (1) essential services, routes, and lines; (2) the required operating differential subsidy; (3) a proper construction program, and (4) the necessary construction differential subsidy for new ships. The policy for all ocean routes should then have been decided, and the transition made from ocean-mail contracts to those contracts provided in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

The intricacy of the problems before the Commission require at least a full year for investigations, hearings, and deliberations. Your committee believe that before a ship operator could be justified in bidding for Government merchant vessels or complete operating lines either under bare-boat charter or by outright purchase, he should be assured of a permanent and definite policy on the part of the Government. A bidder who bids before these essential elements are crystallized will be bidding in the dark. Before a bidder is in a position to prepare an intelligent bid, he must know with reasonable accuracy the conditions he must meet in the operation of the ships for which he is asked to bid.

In section 7 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, provision was made for the sale or charter of vessels, yet in spite of all efforts made by the old Shipping Board, the Government has never been able to make a satisfactory permanent arrangement by which its vessels could be chartered for private operation.

The Commission is now fully informed that there is an operating loss suffered by the Government on these services. This deficit reflects the absence of a mail subsidy.

Under section 603 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the amount of the subsidy shall be determined and payable on the basis of a final accounting made after the end of each year or other period fixed in the contract, but the Commission may provide in the contract for anticipatory payments which it may deem proper prior to the end of the year. Such payments, however, shall not exceed 75 percent of the estimated amount accrued on account of the subsidy.

By section 708 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the Commission may, if in its discretion financial aid is deemed necessary, enter into a contract with any charterer of its vessels for payment to such charterer of an operating differential subsidy upon the same terms and conditions and subject to the same limitations and restrictions as are elsewhere provided in the act with respect to payments of such subsidies to operators of privately owned vessels.

The Commission cannot be in the dark as to the practical difficulties of making these lines pay without a Government subsidy. The present request for bids is apparently an attempt to carry out the letter of the act in respect to the present Government-owned ships and in the light of the ruling of the Acting Comptroller General, but the Commission is handicapped in carrying out the obvious intent and spirit of the act for the best public interest simply because of lack of time, resulting from the wording of the section sought to be changed.

No good can be expected from any hasty step, while serious harm and disadvantages will result from the disturbance of the present operation of the lines and the uncertainty that will result and continue throughout the period of 1 year, during which these proposed charters would be in effect.

Great damage has occurred in the past because of the uncertainty and vacillation of the various successive boards which have repeated their predecessors' mistakes, but have not determined the definite policy which is now contemplated in the new act, although the previous Merchant Marine Acts and the Shipping Act of 1916 had placed this duty upon the old Shipping Board.

The passage of the proposed bill will eliminate this uncertainty until a permanent commission shall have been appointed and afforded time to fix a definite policy, after having given all parties interested full opportunity to present all the facts, during which period the Commission itself may collect complete data and so study the whole broad subject as to enable it to reach a correct conclusion.

The proposed action requires an election of one of three courses. If any bids are received and accepted, there are three possible results:

(1) A new, inexperienced operator will attempt to operate the lines for a year; or (2) the lines may be captured by another operator, and thus eliminate one or more established American shipping companies all leading to the creation of a private American shipping monopoly; or (3) the present operators will continue to operate the lines.

The first eventuality would result in a break-down of the lines through the inexperienced, although well-intentioned, efforts of a new operator who could not possibly get good results in the period of 1 year.

The second eventuality is directly contrary to public policy and the spirit and purpose of all the merchant marine acts since 1916.

The third eventuality is made certain by the proposed legislation.

The expedient of a 1-year charter, leading to any disruption of the present service and their management before the full future program for the American Merchant Marine has been definitely developed and promulgated, can only result in a loss of good will and confidence upon the part of the American shipping public, and a serious loss of revenue to these lines.

It is proposed also to consolidate the American-France Line with the American Hampton Roads Line-Yankee Line into a new line to be known as the American Hampton Roads-Yankee-France-U. K. Line.

The present lines are operated by distinct companies: One the Cosmopolitan Shipping Co., Inc., of New York City, and the other, the Southgate Nelson Corporation of Norfolk, Va. Each of these operators has the confidence and support of the respective communities and for many years has been building a business under the most trying and adverse circumstances. Each of the companies was approved under the old law for an ocean-mail contract which, through no fault of the interested company, was never received. Each of the companies has been in the business through a long period of years. The proposed consolidation has been made without hearings or an opportunity to the interested parties to present their views. A consolidation of these lines was suggested in 1935. The plan was thoroughly investigated then by the Department of Commerce and rejected. There has been nothing since to require a reversal of that decision.

If this plan should be attempted and the consolidated line falls for the short space of 1 year into the hands of an inexperienced bidder with the handicaps of the slow schedule provided, a serious loss of good will at home and abroad will follow.

If this plan should be attempted and either of the present operating companies should receive the charter it will not be in a position to handle to best advantage the business of the other or to retain its goodwill.

The proposed sailing schedule for the consolidated line, in the preparation of which neither company had a part, constitutes an immediate danger, involving delays in delivery of cargo, which is an important element in foreign-flag competition that cannot be disregarded.

The proposed consolidation would transgress the policy declared in the act that lines should be awarded to companies having the support, financial and otherwise, of the respective communities they serve.

The proposed consolidation would serve to eliminate one, and possibly both, of the experienced shipping companies which have been developed at considerable Government expense, have extensive connections for procuring cargo both at home and abroad, and have a wealth of experience derived from many years of past service. The result of the contemplated action would drive one or both of these companies out of business or force the loser to provide foreign-flag competition, thus increasing the present obstacles which must be overcome in creating an American merchant marine.

The consolidation, if made at all, should be made only after exhaustive investigation of many details by the Commission through public hearings, at which all of the operators affected and the interested communities can be heard, and through the collection and examination of data gathered by the Commission itself.

There should be considered (a) the advisability of the consolidation; (b) the proposed sailing schedules; (c) the possibility that the consolidated line might fail for the charter period of 1 year into the hands of an inexperienced operator; and (d) the operating differential subsidy to be granted.

Your committee believes the extension as provided by the proposed legislation to serve many useful purposes, to be in the public interest and to be completely in accord with the policy of the United States upon which the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, is based. Your committee submits that the reasons which it has assigned for the legislation in this report amply sustain that conclusion.

The proposed legislation would afford more time and opportunity to solve the complicated problems involved, and in the opinion of your committee should be speedily enacted into law. The need for immediate action arises from the fact that the bids are called for March 1. That date is fixed because there is a vessel under schedule to sail for Australia on March 3, and the Commission says that it could not make that sailing under the present agreement as the law now stands. Therefore, to preserve the continuity of those voyages, the Commission desires to make the charter parties effective for that voyage so that there will not be any lapse in the service it is now giving on Government-owned vessels.

The report of the United States Maritime Commission on H. R. 4207 is as follows:

[No. 11]

EXTENDING TIME FOR DISCONTINUANCE OF PRIVATE OPERATION OF SHIP LINES BELONGING TO MARITIME COMMISSION (H. R. 4207). MR. O'LEARY

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1937.

Hon. S. O. BLAND,
Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In your communication of February 5, 1937, you requested the views and recommendations of the Commission concerning H. R. 4207, a bill to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 U. S. Stat. L. 2008–2009).

Section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, reads as follows:

"All vessels transferred to or otherwise acquired by the Commission in any manner may be chartered or sold by the Commission pursuant to the further provisions of this act. All vessels transferred to the Commission by this act and now being operated by private operators on lines in foreign commerce of the United States may be temporarily operated by the Commission for its account by private operators until such time and upon such operating agreements as the Commission may deem advantageous, but the Commission shall arrange as soon as practicable to offer all such lines of vessels for charter as hereinafter provided, and all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under such operating agreements shall be discontinued within 1 year after the passage of this act."

It will be noted that it is provided that all vessels transferred to the Commission and now being operated by private operators on lines in foreign commerce may be temporarily operated by the Commission for its account by private operators. This temporary operation is required to be upon such operating agreements as the Commission may deem advantageous. It is further provided that the Commission shall arrange, as soon as practicable, to offer all such lines for charter and, finally, that all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under operating agreements shall be discontinued within 1 year after the passage of this act.

If the amendment proposed to section 704 should be adopted, the only change effected would be to extend the maximum permissible time allowed for operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under existing or substituted operating agreements to a date 2 years after the passage of the act. The amendment would leave in effect the other provisions of section 704 referred to above, which prescribe that the lines may be temporarily operated by the Commission and upon operating agreements deemed advantageous and the further requirement that as soon as practicable the Commission shall arrange to offer all such lines of vessels for charter as provided for in the act.

The duties of the Commission in respect to the disposition of its vessels are further set forth in section 705, Merchant Marine Act, 1936, which reads as follows:

"As soon as practicable after the passage of this act, and continuing thereafter, the Commission shall arrange for the employment of its vessels in steamship lines on such trade routes, exclusively serving the foreign trade of the United States, as the Commission shall determine are necessary and essential for the development and maintenance of the commerce of the United States and the national defense: Provided, That such needs are not being adequately served by existing steamship lines privately owned and operated by citizens of the United States and documented under the laws of the United States. It shall be the policy of the Commission to encourage private operation of each essential steamship line now owned by the United States by selling such lines to citizens of the United States in the manner provided in section 7 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, and in strict accordance with the provisions of section 5 of said act, or by demising its vessels on bare-boat charter to citizens of the United States who shall agree to maintain such line or lines in the manner hereinafter provided."

And in the second proviso of section 7, Merchant Marine Act, 1920, which reads as follows: "Provided further, That where steamship lines and regular service have been established and are being maintained by ships of the board at the time of the enactment of this act, such lines and service shall be maintained by the board until, in the opinion of the board, the maintenance thereof is unbusinesslike and against the public interests."

On June 29, 1936, at the time of the passage of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the following lines of vessels transferred to the Commission by the provisions of that act were being operated by private operators under operating agreements for the account of the Commission: American Pioneer Line, American Republics Line, Oriole Lines, America-France Lines, and American Hampton Roads Line-Yankee Line. As some of the vessels in the above lines are engaged in voyages that last approximately 4 months, it is necessary for the Commission, in order to terminate operations within the period prescribed, either to lay up the vessels or to offer them for sale or charter.

The Commission since its appointment has been engaged, among other things, in making a study of the steamship services, routes, and lines, in order to determine what services, routes, and lines are necessary and essential for the development and maintenance of the foreign commerce of the United States and the national defense. While the Commission has not concluded its study of the essentiality of the privately owned services, routes, and lines in the foreign commerce of the United States, it is of the opinion that it would not be advisable at this time to completely abandon the Government-owned lines and has offered them for charter on a bare-boat charter basis for a temporary period. The bids are to be opened March 1, 1937.

In offering the lines for charter, the trade routes and ports to be served by the American Republics Line, American Pioneer Line, and Oriole Lines are substantially the same as those heretofore served in those three lines. The service formerly offered by the America-France Line has been combined with the service previously offered by the American Hampton Roads Line-Yankee Line and the combined service will be operated under the name of American Hampton Roads Yankee-France U. K. Line. Because of the excessive losses incurred in the operation of the vessels of the America-France Line and the vessels of the American Hampton Roads Line-Yankee Line, it is expected that the consolidation of those two lines will result in much more economical operation and at the same time provide adequate service for the ports now served. Upon the conclusion of the temporary operation under bare-boat charters, the Commission will have doubtless determined the necessity for the further operation of the Government-owned vessels.

The Maritime Commission is convinced that the proposed extension of time for Government operation of ships will serve no useful purpose, and is not in the public interest, and would not be in accord with the policy of the United States upon which existing shipping laws are based. It recommends, therefore, that H. R. 4207 be not passed.

Faithfully yours,

(Signed) H. A. WILEY, Chairman.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

In compliance with paragraph 2a of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended by this bill is herewith set forth. Existing law in which no change is proposed is shown in roman type; the matter proposed to be eliminated is enclosed in black brackets; and the new matter proposed to be added by the bill is printed in italic, as follows:

SEC. 704. All vessels transferred to or otherwise acquired by the Commission in any manner may be chartered or sold by the Commission pursuant to the further provisions of this act. All vessels transferred to the Commission by this act and now being operated by private operators on lines in foreign commerce of the United States [may] shall be temporarily operated by the Commission for its account by private operators until such time and upon such operating agreements as the Commission may deem advantageous, preference to be given to present operators, [but the Commission shall arrange as soon as practicable to offer all such lines of vessels for charter as hereinafter provided] and all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under such operating agreements shall be discontinued [within 1 year after the passage of this act.] as soon as practicable after December 31, 1937: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall be construed as limiting or affecting the power of sale under the provisions of section 705 of this act.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. REYNOLDS:

By Mr. ANDREWS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 107) to amend Private Act No. 210, approved August 13, 1935, by substituting as payee therein the Clark Dredging Co. in lieu of the Bowers Southern Dredging Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SCHWELLENBACH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) to salvage Indian remains of scientific importance in the State of Washington; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. COPELAND (for himself and Mr. WAGNER):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 109) to provide that the United States extend to foreign governments invitations to participate in the International Congress of Architects to be held in the United States during the calendar year 1939, and to authorize an appropriation to assist in meeting the expenses of the session; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Immigration:

H. R. 28. An act to authorize the deportation of aliens who secured preference-quota or nonquota visas through fraud by contracting marriage solely to fraudulently expedite admission to the United States, and for other purposes;

H. R. 29. An act to declare that a citizen of the United States who votes in a political election in a foreign state or who participates in certain voting abroad to determine sovereignty of foreign territory shall lose United States citizenship and nationality; and

H. R. 3679. An act to restrict habitual commuting of aliens from foreign contiguous territory to engage in skilled or unskilled labor or employment in continental United States.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion by Mr. BACHMAN, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 636) for the relief of Walter C. Blake, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN POSTMASTERS—AMENDMENT

Mr. HAYDEN (for himself and Mr. MINTON) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. 77) for payment of compensation to persons serving as postmasters at third- and fourth-class post offices, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE IN BITUMINOUS COAL—AMENDMENTS

Mr. AUSTIN submitted seven amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes, which were severally referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WHEELER

[Mr. CONNALLY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary, delivered by Senator WHEELER, on the evening of Mar. 10, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BURKE

[Mr. WALSH asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Senator BURKE at Carnegie Hall, New York City, Mar. 12, 1937, relative to the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary, which appears in the Appendix.]

ERIN'S OFFERING—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CONNALLY

[Mr. MALONEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "Erin's Offering", delivered by Senator CONNALLY at the annual dinner of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, held at Washington, D. C., on Mar. 17, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

ST. PATRICK'S DAY ADDRESS BY SENATOR GUFFEY

[Mr. LONERGAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Senator GUFFEY before the Clover Club of Boston at their St. Patrick's Day dinner, on Mar. 13, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY—STATEMENT OF THOMAS F. KONOP

[Mr. MURRAY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the statement of Dean Thomas F. Konop, of the Law School of the University of Notre Dame, on the proposal to reorganize the Federal judiciary, made before the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate yesterday, which appears in the Appendix.]

CONSIDERATION OF UNOBJECTED BILLS ON THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will state the first order of business on the calendar.

RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 8) limiting debate on general appropriation bills was announced as first in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 548) for the relief of Dorothy White, Mrs. Carol M. White, and Charles A. White was announced as next in order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1095) to provide a government for American Samoa was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1435) to create a board of shorthand reporting, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1436) providing for the employment of skilled shorthand reporting in the executive branch of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION AND COMPLETION OF THE CAPITOL

The bill (S. 1170) to provide for the extension and completion of the United States Capitol was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think on all previous calls of the calendar, when this order of business was reached, objection has been made. I am not going to make objection at this time, but there has been some reason for those objections. Apparently the Senator who made them is not present at this time. However, if we are to consider the bill, I think that at this time a statement should be made concerning its provisions.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, because of the importance of the bill I think it ought not to be taken up for consideration and passed on a call of the calendar. I may be wrong about it. I have not studied the provisions of the bill. I should not object to taking it up in the regular order, but it seems to me that a measure of this importance should not be passed practically by unanimous consent. There are different views on the subject, and we ought to take it up in the regular way and consider it carefully.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the bill is too important to be considered under the order which is now being carried out by the Senate. Probably the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] will agree to that. Let me say that I think he or someone else should ask to have the bill go over. I myself will do so if he does not.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not going to press the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to add that an early opportunity may be had to consider the bill if the Senator desires to take it up at some time in the near future.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall not insist on consideration of the measure today, but I should like to say, in agreement with the view expressed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], that at some early date I hope to be able to have the opportunity to move to have the bill considered. Senators will recall that it passed the Senate in the last Congress, but did not receive consideration in the House. I believe it was not even reported by the House committee.

The matter is one that has been more or less pending from time to time since the House and Senate wings of the Capitol were completed some time in the sixties or late fifties of the last century. The bill proposes to complete the plan then adopted for the center section of the Capitol. I have no disposition to press the bill this morning, but I hope at an early date to be able to make a motion to have the Senate proceed to its consideration, if the Senator from Arkansas will cooperate to that end. The bill may go over at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 792) for the relief of Sam Larson, guardian of Margaret Larson, a minor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 48) to authorize an appropriation for investigation under the Federal reclamation laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this appears to be an important bill. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. OMAHONEY], who introduced the bill and who also reported it from the committee, is necessarily detained from the Senate. I suggest that the bill go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) for the payment of certain employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia and employees of the District of Columbia for January 20, 1937, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING, OAKLAND, CALIF.

The bill (S. 1470) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old post-office building at Oakland, Calif., and to convey to the city of Oakland portions of the site for street-widening purposes in accordance with the provisions of public act approved August 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 800), was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved April 11, 1936 (49 Stat. 1202), to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes", approved May 25, 1926, authorizing and empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of the old post-office building and to sell all of the site thereof at Oakland, Calif., is hereby amended by canceling the second sentence thereof and substituting the following: "The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby further authorized to sell the old post-office site situated at Broadway, Seventeenth, and Franklin Streets, in Oakland, Calif., at such time, for such price, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem to be to the best interest of the United States, and to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed, the proceeds of said sale to be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from favorably considering an application of the city of Oakland for the conveyance to said city of such portion or portions of the site as the Secretary may agree are necessary for street-widening purposes in accordance with the provisions of public act approved August 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 800; U. S. C., title 40, sec. 345b)."

JOINT RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 102) authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11, 1937, General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 23) authorizing the President of the United States to proclaim October 11 of each year General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that this joint resolution and the three that follow it—Senate Joint Resolutions 23, 24, 33, and 74, all relating to the same subject—be passed over for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolutions will be passed over.

GREATER TEXAS AND PAN AMERICAN EXPOSITION

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 221) to permit articles imported from foreign countries for the purpose of exhibition at the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition, Dallas, Tex., to be admitted without payment of tariff, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the purpose of exhibition at the international exposition to be held at Dallas, Tex., beginning in June 1937, by the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition, a corporation, or for use in constructing, installing, or maintaining foreign buildings or exhibits at the said exhibition, upon which articles there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted without payment of such tariff, customs duty, fees, or charges under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during or within 3 months after the close of the said exposition to sell within the area of the exposition any articles provided for herein, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, shall be subject to the duties, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of their withdrawal; and on such articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling or exposure, the duties, if payable, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal from entry hereunder for consumption or entry under the general tariff law: Provided further, That imported articles provided for herein shall not be subject to any marking requirements of the general tariff laws, except when such articles are withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States in which case they shall not be released from customs custody until properly marked, but no additional duty shall be assessed because such articles were not sufficiently marked when imported into the United States: Provided further, That at any time during or within 3 months after the close of the exposition, any article entered hereunder may be abandoned to the Government or destroyed under customs supervision, whereupon any duties on such article shall be remitted: Provided further, That articles which have been admitted without payment of duty for exhibition under any tariff law and which have remained in continuous customs custody or under a customs exhibition bond and imported articles in bonded warehouses under the general tariff law may be accorded the privilege of transfer to and entry for exhibition at the said exposition under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: And provided further, That the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition shall be deemed, for customs purposes only, to be the sole consignee of all merchandise imported under the provisions of this act, and that the actual and necessary customs charges for labor, services, and other expenses in connection with the entry, examination, appraisement, release, or custody, together with the necessary charges for salaries of customs officers and employees in connection with the supervision, custody of, and accounting for, articles imported under the provisions of this act shall be reimbursed by the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition to the Government of the United States under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that receipts from such reimbursements shall be deposited as refunds to the appropriation from which paid, in the manner provided for in section 524, Tariff Act of 1930.

SAFETY OF LIFE AND PROPERTY AT SEA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 595) to amend the Communications Act of 1934, approved June 19, 1934, for the purpose of promoting safety of life and property at sea through the use of wire and radio communications, to make more effective the International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea, 1929, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That section 1 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended by inserting after the words "for the purpose of the national defense" a comma and the words "for the purpose of promoting safety of life and property through the use of wire and radio communication."

SEC. 2. Section 3 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof five new subsections to read as follows:

"(w) (1) 'Ship' or 'vessel' includes every description of watercraft or other artificial contrivance, except aircraft, used or capable of being used as a means of transportation on water, whether or not it is actually afloat.

"(2) A ship shall be considered a passenger ship if it carries or is licensed or certificated to carry more than 12 passengers.

"(3) A cargo ship means any ship not a passenger ship.

"(4) A passenger is any person carried on board a ship or vessel except (1) the officers and crew actually employed to man and operate the ship, (2) persons employed to carry on the business of the ship, and (3) persons on board a ship when they are carried, either because of the obligation laid upon the master to carry shipwrecked, distressed, or other persons in like or similar situations or by reason of any circumstance over which neither the master, the owner, nor the charterer (if any) has control.

"(x) 'Auto-alarm' on a foreign ship means an automatic alarm receiver which has been approved by the country to which the ship belongs, provided the United States and the country to which the ship belongs are both parties to the same treaty, convention, or agreement prescribing the requirements for such apparatus. 'Auto-alarm' on a ship of the United States subject to the provisions of part II of title III of this act means an automatic alarm receiver complying with law and approved by the Commission. Nothing in this act or in any other provision of law shall be construed to require the recognition of an auto-alarm as complying with part II of title III of this act, on a foreign ship subject to such part, whose country of origin is not a party to a treaty, convention, or agreement with the United States in regard to such apparatus.

"(y) (1) For the purpose of part II of title III, a 'qualified operator' or 'operator' on a foreign ship means a person holding a certificate as such complying with the provisions of the General Radio Regulations annexed to the International Telecommunication Convention in force, or complying with an agreement or treaty between the United States and the country to which the ship belongs.

"(2) For the purpose of part II of title III, a 'qualified operator' or 'operator' on a ship of the United States means a person holding a radio operator's license of the proper class, as prescribed and issued by the Commission.

"(z) 'Harbor' or 'port' means any place to which ships may resort for shelter or to load or unload passengers or goods, or to obtain fuel, water, or supplies. This term shall apply to such places whether proclaimed public or not and whether natural or artificial.

"(aa) 'Safety convention' means the International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea in force and the regulations referred to therein.

"SEC. 3. Subsection (k) of section 4 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended by substituting a colon for the period at the end of the subsection and adding the following: 'Provided further, That each year, at the beginning of the session of the Congress, the Commission shall report to the Congress whether or not any new wire or radio communication legislation is required better to insure safety of life and property. If any such new legislation is considered necessary the Commission shall make specific recommendations thereof to the Congress.'"

SEC. 4. Section 4 of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection to read as follows:

"(o) For the purpose of obtaining maximum effectiveness from the use of radio and wire communications in connection with safety of life and property, the Commission shall investigate and study all phases of the problem and the best methods of obtaining the cooperation and coordination of these systems."

SEC. 5. Paragraph (m) of section 303 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(m) (1) Have authority to suspend the license of any operator upon proof sufficient to satisfy the Commission that the licensee—

"(A) has violated any provision of any act, treaty, or convention binding on the United States, which the Commission is authorized to administer, or any regulation made by the Commission under any such act, treaty, or convention; or

"(B) has failed to carry out a lawful order of the master or person lawfully in charge of the ship or aircraft on which he is employed; or

"(C) has willfully damaged or permitted radio apparatus or installations to be damaged; or

"(D) has transmitted superfluous radio communications or signals or communications containing profane or obscene words, language, or meaning, or has knowingly transmitted—

"(1) false or deceptive signals or communications, or

"(2) a call signal or letter which has not been assigned by proper authority to the station he is operating; or

"(E) has willfully or maliciously interfered with any other radio communications or signals; or

"(F) has obtained or attempted to obtain, or has assisted another to obtain or attempt to obtain, an operator's license by fraudulent means.

"(2) No order of suspension of any operator's license shall take effect until 15 days' notice in writing thereof, stating the cause for the proposed suspension, has been given to the operator licensee, who may make written application to the Commission at any time within said 15 days for a hearing upon such order. The notice to the operator licensee shall not be effective until actually received by him, and from that time he shall have 15 days in which to mail the said application. In the event that physical conditions prevent mailing of the application at the expiration of the 15-day period, the application shall then be mailed as soon as possible thereafter, accompanied by a satisfactory explanation of the delay. Upon receipt by the Commission of such application for hearing, said order of suspension shall be held in abeyance until the conclusion of the hearing, which shall be conducted under such rules as the Commission may prescribe. Upon the conclusion of said hearing the Commission may affirm, modify, or revoke said order of suspension."

SEC. 6. (a) Subsection (n) of section 303 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(n) Have authority to inspect all radio installations associated with stations required to be licensed by any act or which are subject to the provisions of any act, treaty, or convention binding on the United States, to ascertain whether in construction, installation, and operation they conform to the requirements of the rules and regulations of the Commission, the provisions of any act, the terms of any treaty or convention binding on the United States, and the conditions of the license or other instrument of authorization under which they are constructed, installed, or operated."

(b) Section 303 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby further amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection to read as follows:

"(r) Make such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, or any international radio or wire communications treaty or convention, or regulations annexed thereto, including any treaty or convention insofar as it relates to the use of radio, to which the United States is or may hereafter become a party."

SEC. 7. Section 321 (a) of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 321. (a) The transmitting set in a radio station on shipboard may be adjusted in such a manner as to produce a maximum of radiation, irrespective of the amount of interference which may thus be caused, when such station is sending radio communications or signals of distress and radio communications relating thereto."

SEC. 8. Section 322 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 322. Every land station open to general public service between the coast and vessels or aircraft at sea shall, within the scope of its normal operations, be bound to exchange radio communications or signals with any ship or aircraft station at sea; and each station on shipboard or aircraft at sea shall, within the scope of its normal operations, be bound to exchange radio communications or signals with any other station on shipboard or aircraft at sea or with any land station open to general public service between the coast and vessels or aircraft at sea: Provided, That such exchange of radio communication shall be without distinction as to radio systems or instruments adopted by each station."

SEC. 9. Section 329 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 329. The Commission is authorized to designate any officer or employee of any other department of the Government on duty in any Territory or possession of the United States to render therein such service in connection with the administration of this act as the Commission may prescribe and also to designate any officer or employee of any other department of the Government to render such services at any place within the United States in connection with the administration of title III of this act as may be necessary: Provided, That such designation shall be approved by the head of the department in which such person is employed."

SEC. 10. (a) The heading of title III of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"TITLE III. PROVISIONS RELATING TO RADIO

"PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

(b) Such title III is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new part as follows:

"PART II. RADIO EQUIPMENT AND RADIO OPERATORS ON BOARD SHIP

"Ship radio installations and operations

"SEC. 351. Except as provided in section 352 hereof, it shall be unlawful—

"(a) For any ship of the United States, other than a cargo ship of less than 1,600 gross tons, to be navigated in the open sea outside of a harbor or port, or for any ship of the United States or any foreign country, other than a cargo ship of less than 1,600 gross tons, to leave or attempt to leave any harbor or port of the United States for a voyage in the open sea, unless such ship is equipped with an efficient radio installation in operating condition, in charge of and operated by a qualified operator or operators, adequately installed and protected so as to insure proper operation, and so as not to endanger the ship and radio installation, as hereinafter provided, and in the case of a ship of the United States, unless there is on board a valid station license issued in accordance with this act;

"(b) For any passenger ship of the United States of 5,000 gross tons, or over, to be navigated outside of a harbor or port, in the open sea, or for any such ship of the United States or any foreign country to leave or attempt to leave any harbor or port of the United States for a voyage in the open sea, unless such ship is equipped with an efficient radio direction finder apparatus (radio compass) properly adjusted in operating condition as hereinafter provided, which apparatus is approved by the Commission;

"(c) A ship which is not subject to the provisions of this part at the time of its departure on a voyage shall not become subject to such provisions on account of any deviation from its intended voyage due to stress of weather or any other cause over which neither the master, the owner, nor the charterer (if any) has control.

"Exceptions

"SEC. 352. (a) The provisions of this part shall not apply to—

"(1) A ship of war;

"(2) A ship of the United States belonging to and operated by the Government, except a ship of the United States Maritime Commission, the Inland and Coastwise Waterways Service, or the Panama Railroad Co.;

"(3) A foreign ship belonging to a country which is a party to the Safety Convention and which ship carries a valid certificate exempting said ship from the radio provisions of that convention, or which ship conforms to the radio requirements of such convention or regulations and has on board a valid certificate to that effect.

"(b) The Commission may, if it considers that the route or the conditions of the voyage or other circumstances are such as to render a radio installation unreasonable or unnecessary for the purposes of this part, exempt from the provisions of this part any ship, or any class of ships, which falls within any of the following descriptions:

"(1) Passenger ships which in the course of their voyage do not go more than 20 nautical miles from the nearest land or more than 200 nautical miles between two consecutive ports;

"(2) Cargo ships which in the course of their voyage do not go more than 150 nautical miles from the nearest land;

"(3) Barges in tow;

"(4) Sailing ships.

"Operators, watches, auto-alarm

"SEC. 353. (a) Each cargo ship required by this part to be fitted with a radio installation and which is not fitted with an auto-alarm, and each passenger ship required by this part to be fitted with a radio installation, shall, for safety purposes, carry at least two qualified operators.

"(b) A cargo ship, required by this part to be fitted with a radio installation, which is fitted with an auto-alarm in accordance with this title, shall, for safety purposes, carry at least one qualified operator who shall have had at least 6 months' previous service in the aggregate as a qualified operator in a station on board a ship or ships of the United States.

"(c) Each ship of the United States required by this part to be fitted with a radio installation shall, while being navigated outside a harbor or port, keep a continuous watch by means of qualified operators: Provided, however, That in lieu thereof on a cargo ship fitted with an auto-alarm in proper operating condition, a watch of at least 8 hours per day, in the aggregate, shall be maintained by means of a qualified operator.

"(d) The Commission shall, when it finds it necessary for safety purposes, have authority to prescribe the particular hours of watch on a ship of the United States required by this part to be fitted with a radio installation.

"(e) On all ships of the United States fitted with an auto-alarm, said apparatus shall be in operation at all times while the ship is being navigated outside of a harbor or port when the operator is not on watch.

"Technical requirements

"SEC. 354. The radio installation and the radio direction-finding apparatus required by section 351 of this part shall comply with the following requirements:

"(a) The radio installation shall comprise a main and an emergency or reserve installation: Provided, however, That on a cargo ship, if the main installation complies also with all the requirements of an emergency or reserve installation, the emergency or reserve installation may be omitted.

"(b) The ship's radio operating room and the emergency or reserve installation shall be placed in the upper part of the ship in a position of the greatest possible safety and as high as practicable above the deepest load water line, and the location of such room or rooms shall be approved by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, Department of Commerce.

"(c) The main and emergency or reserve installations shall be capable of transmitting and receiving on the frequencies and types of waves designated by the Commission pursuant to law for the purpose of distress and safety of navigation.

"(d) The main installation shall have a normal transmitting and receiving range of at least 200 nautical miles, that is to say, it must be capable of transmitting and receiving clearly perceptible signals from ship to ship over a range of at least 200 nautical miles by day under normal conditions and circumstances.

"(e) Sufficient power shall be available at all times to operate the main radio installation efficiently under normal conditions over the range specified in subsection (d) of this section.

"(f) The emergency or reserve installation shall include a source of energy independent of the propelling power of the ship and of any other electrical system and shall be capable of being put into operation rapidly and of working for at least 6 continuous hours. For the emergency or reserve installation, the normal range as defined in subsection (d) of this section shall be at least 100 nautical miles.

"(g) There shall be provided between the bridge of the ship and the radio room, and between the bridge and the location of the direction finding apparatus, when the direction finding appartus is not located on the bridge, an efficient means of communication independent of any other communication system of the ship.

"(h) The direction finding apparatus shall be efficient and capable for receiving clearly perceptible radio signals and of taking bearings from which the true bearing and direction may be determined. It shall be capable of receiving signals on the frequencies prescribed for distress, direction finding, and radio beacons by the General Radio Regulations annexed to the International Tele-Communication Convention in force and in new installations after the effective date of this part, such other frequencies as the Commission may for safety purposes designate.

"Lifeboats

"SEC. 355. Every motor lifeboat, required to be equipped with radio by treaty or convention to which the United States is a party, by statute, or by regulation made in conformity with a treaty, convention, or statute, shall be fitted with an efficient radio installation under such rules and regulations as the Commission may find necessary to promote the safety of life.

"Approval of installations

"SEC. 356. (a) Insofar as is necessary to carry out the purposes and requirements of this part, the Commission shall have authority, for any ship subject to this part—

"(1) To approve the details as to the location and manner of installations of the equipment required by this part or of equipment necessitated by reason of the purposes and requirements of this part.

"(2) To approve installations, apparatus, and spare parts necessary to comply with the purposes and requirements of this part.

"(3) To prescribe such additional equipment as may be determined to be necessary to supplement that specified herein, for the proper functioning of the radio installation installed in accordance with this part or for the proper conduct of radio communication in time of emergency or distress.

"Transmission of information

"SEC. 357. (a) The master of every ship of the United States equipped with radio transmitting apparatus, on meeting with dangerous ice, a dangerous derelict, a tropical storm, or any other direct danger to navigation, shall cause to be transmitted all pertinent information relating thereto, to ships in the vicinity and to the appropriate authorities, in accordance with rules and regulations issued by the Commission, which authorities of the United States shall, when they consider it necessary, promptly bring the information received by them to the knowledge of those concerned, and foreign authorities interested.

"(b) No charge shall be made by any ship or station in the mobile service of the United States for the transmission, receipt, or relay of the information designated in subsection (a) originating on a ship of the United States or of a foreign country.

"(c) The transmission by any ship of the United States, made in compliance with subsection (a), to any station which imposes a charge for the reception, relay, or forwarding of the required information, shall be free of cost to the ship concerned and any communication charges incurred by the ship for transmission, relay, or forwarding of the information may be certified to the Commission for reimbursement out of moneys appropriated to the Commission for that purpose.

"(d) No charge shall be made by any ship or station in the mobile service of the United States for the transmission of distress messages and replies thereto in connection with situations involving the safety of life and property at sea.

"(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any station or carrier may render free service in connection with situations involving the safety of life and property, including hydrographic reports, weather reports, reports regarding aids to navigation and medical assistance to injured or sick persons on ships and aircraft at sea. All free service permitted by this subsection shall be subject to such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe, which rules may limit such free service to the extent which the Commission finds desirable in the public interest.

"Authority of master

"SEC. 358. The radio installation, the operators, the regulation of their watches, the transmission and receipt of messages, and the radio service of the ship except as they may be regulated by law or international agreement, or by rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof, shall in the case of a ship of the United States be under the supreme control of the master.

"Certificates

"SEC. 359. (a) Each vessel of the United States to which the safety convention applies shall comply with the radio and communication provisions of said convention at all times while the vessel is in use, in addition to all other requirements of law, and have on board an appropriate certificate as prescribed by the safety convention.

"(b) Appropriate certificates concerning the radio particulars provided for in said convention shall be issued to any vessel of the United States which is subject to the radio provisions of the safety convention and is found by the Commission to comply therewith. Such certificates shall be issued by the Department of Commerce, or whatever other agency is authorized by law so to do, upon request of the Commission made after proper inspection or determination of the facts. If the holder of such certificate violates the provisions of the safety convention, or of this act, or the rules, regulations, or conditions prescribed by the Commission, and if the effective administration of the safety convention or of this part so requires, the Commission, after hearing in accordance with law, is authorized to request the modification or cancelation of such certificate. Upon receipt of such request the Department of Commerce, or whatever other agency is authorized by law to do so, shall modify or cancel the certificate in accord therewith. The Commission is authorized to issue, modify, or cancel such certificates in the event that no other agency is authorized to do so.

"Inspections

"SEC. 360. (a) In addition to any other provisions required to be included in a radio-station license, the station license of each ship of the United States subject to this title shall include particulars with reference to the items specifically required by this title.

"(b) Every ship of the United States, subject to this part, shall have the equipment and apparatus prescribed therein, inspected at least once each year by the Commission. If, after such inspection, the Commission is satisfied that all relevant provisions of this act and the station license have been complied with, that fact shall be certified to on the station license by the Commission. The Commission shall make such additional inspections at frequent intervals as may be necessary to insure compliance with the requirements of this act.

"Control by Commission

"SEC. 361. Nothing in this title shall be interpreted as lessening in any degree the control of the Commission over all matters connected with the radio equipment and its operation on shipboard and its decision and determination in regard to the radio requirements, installations, or exemptions from prescribed radio requirements shall be final, subject only to review in accordance with law.

"Forfeitures

"SEC. 362. The following forfeitures shall apply to this part, in addition to the penalties and forfeitures provided by title V of this act:

"(a) Any ship that leaves or attempts to leave any harbor or port of the United States in violation of the provisions of this part, or the rules and regulations of the Commission made in pursuance thereof, or any ship of the United States that is navigated outside of any harbor or port in violation of any of the provisions of this part, or the rules and regulations of the Commission made in pursuance thereof, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500, recoverable by way of suit or libel. Each such departure or attempted departure, and in the case of a ship of the United States each day during which such navigation occurs shall constitute a separate offense.

"(b) Every willful failure on the part of the master of a ship of the United States to enforce or to comply with the provisions of this act or the rules and regulations of the Commission as to equipment, operators, watches, or radio service shall cause him to forfeit to the United States the sum of $100."

SEC. 11. Paragraph (a) of section 402 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended by inserting after the words "or for modifications of an existing radio station license" a comma and the words "or suspending a radio operator's license."

SEC. 12. Subsection (b) of section 402 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"(3) By any radio operator whose license has been suspended by the Commission."

SEC. 13. Paragraph (c) of section 402 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended by inserting after the words in the last sentence "upon the application" the words "or order."

SEC. 14. Section 504 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Provisions relating to forfeitures

"SEC. 504 (a) The forfeitures provided for in this act shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States brought in the district where the person or carrier has its principal operating office or in any district through which the line or system of the carrier runs: Provided, That in the case of forfeiture by a ship, said forfeiture may also be recoverable by way of libel in any district in which such ship shall arrive or depart. Such forfeitures shall be in addition to any other general or specific penalties herein provided. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures under this act. The costs and expenses of such prosecutions shall be paid from the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

"(b) The forfeitures imposed by title III, of part II of this act shall be subject to remission or mitigation by the Commission, upon application therefor, under such regulations and methods of ascertaining the facts as may seem to it advisable, and, if suit has been instituted, the Attorney General, upon request of the Commission, shall direct the discontinuance of any prosecution to recover such forfeitures: Provided, however, That no forfeiture shall be remitted or mitigated after determination by a court of competent jurisdiction."

SEC. 15. Section 602 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection to read as follows:

"(e) Such part or parts of the act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers", approved June 24, 1910, as amended, as relate to the ocean and to steamers navigating thereon, are hereby repealed. In all other respects said act shall continue in full force and effect. The Commission is requested and directed to make a special study of the radio requirements necessary or desirable for safety purposes for ships navigating the Great Lakes and the inland waters of the United States, and to report its recommendations, and the reasons therefor, to the Congress not later than December 31, 1939."

SEC. 16. This act shall take effect upon approval, provided that the Commission may defer the application of all or any part of sections 351 to 355, inclusive, for a period not to exceed 6 months after approval, in regard to any ship or classes of ships of the United States which are not subject to the provisions of the safety convention, if it is found impracticable to obtain the necessary equipment or make the required installations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this appears to be a bill of importance. I do not desire to object to the bill, because it is in the interest of safety; but I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who conducted the hearings this year, I will say that a similar bill was passed by the Senate at the last session. This year the present bill was made a special order in the Committee on Commerce. Long hearings were held. A full agreement was reached by all parties in interest; and by unanimous vote of the committee it was recommended that the bill be reported for the calendar and be passed.

The bill provides, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, for carrying out the conclusions of the International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea. It provides for radio on ships, so that in case of disaster or distress there may be communication. The bill is in the public interest and certainly is in the interest of the preservation of human life.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the matter having been considered by the Senate heretofore, I am sure it is not necessary to read the amendment, which is a long one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the reading of the amendment will be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 470) for the relief of Joseph M. Cacace, Charles M. Cacace, and Mary E. Clibourne was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. May we have an explanation of the bill? Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN EDGAR WHITE

The bill (H. R. 3067) for the relief of John Edgar White, a minor, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000 to Thomas B. White, father, as natural guardian for John Edgar White, minor, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for personal injuries to said minor's left leg by burning and for medical charges incurred as a result of said injuries occasioned by the said minor stepping into soft dirt which covered a steam line in process of repair in the vicinity of ward 21 in the Walter Reed Hospital grounds, Washington, D. C.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agency or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

CONTINUOUS DISCHARGE BOOK FOR SEAMEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5487) to amend section 4551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 46, sec. 643), which was read.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it does not appear on the face of the bill what amendments are proposed to the existing law. I think the Senate should be informed as to that.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill is intended to correct the alleged evils of the so-called "Copeland fink book" law, the Continuous Discharge Act. The matter involved has been used as one of the features in the sea strike.

The seamen representing the West Coast Independent Seamen's Organization, the American Federation of Labor, and the Department of Commerce, through the Bureau of Navigation, have agreed upon the terms set forth in the pending bill. There was a long hearing in the House committee, covering the four or five volumes of material which I now exhibit to the Senate. The Senate committee, after very serious study and consideration of the matter, agreed to the passage of this bill. Doubtless it should be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 46, sec. 643), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4551. (a) Every seaman upon a merchant vessel of the United States of the burden of 100 gross tons or upward, except vessels employed exclusively in trade on the navigable rivers of the United States, shall be furnished, at the option of the seaman, with a book to be known as a continuous discharge book or with a certificate of identification, which book or certificate shall be retained by the seaman and shall contain the signature of the seaman to whom it is so furnished and a statement of his nationality, age, personal description, photograph, thumbprint, and home address. Such books or certificates shall be issued by the shipping commissioners, or, at ports where no shipping commissioners have been appointed, by collectors or deputy collectors of customs or United States local inspectors of steam vessels, in such manner and form as the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall determine. Any individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association which shall issue any such book or certificate, or make any statement or endorsement therein, except as authorized by the provisions of this section, or issue any imitation of any such book or certificate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not less than 1 month nor more than 3 months, in the discretion of the court.

"(b) Any person applying for such book or certificate and claiming to be a citizen of the United States shall furnish satisfactory evidence of such citizenship.

"(c) No seaman shall be employed on any vessel to which this section applies until he has exhibited a certificate of identification or a continuous discharge book to the shipping commissioner, or in cases where seamen are not signed on before the shipping commissioner, to the master of the vessel: Provided, That the provisions of this subsection shall not apply to the employment of seamen at a foreign port or place, in which case seamen so employed shall be furnished a continuous discharge book or a certificate of identification, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, at the first port of entry in the United States or its territories at which the vessel arrives after such seamen are so employed.

"(d) Upon the discharge of any seaman and the payment of his wages the shipping commissioner shall enter in the continuous-discharge book of such seaman, if the seaman carries such a book, the name and official number of the vessel, the nature of the voyage (foreign, intercoastal, or coastwise), the class to which the vessel belongs (steam, motor, sail, or barge), the date and place of the shipment and of the discharge of such seaman, the rating (capacity in which employed) then held by such seaman, and the signature of the person making such entries, and nothing more.

"(e) For the purpose of furnishing evidence of sea service in the case of seamen preferring the certificate of identification instead of the continuous-discharge book, the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall provide a certificate of discharge, printed on durable paper, in such form as to specify the name and citizenship of the seaman to whom it is issued, the serial number of his certificate of identification, the name and official number of the vessel, the nature of the voyage (foreign, intercoastal, or coastwise), the class to which the vessel belongs (steam, motor, sail, or barge), the date and place of the shipment and of the discharge of such seaman, and the rating (capacity in which employed) then held by such seaman. Records of service entered in either continuous-discharge books or certificates of discharge shall contain no reference to the character or ability of the seaman. The shipping commissioner shall issue such certificate of discharge and make the proper entries therein, which certificate shall be signed by the seaman to whom it is issued and the master of the vessel and shall be witnessed by such shipping commissioner.

"(f) There shall be maintained in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation in Washington, D. C., a record of every continuous-discharge book, certificate of identification, certificate of discharge, and any other certificate issued by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, together with the name and address of the seaman to whom it is issued and of his next of kin, and certified copies of all entries made in continuous-discharge books or certificates of discharge, which entries shall be forwarded to the Bureau by the shipping commissioner or other person making such entries in accordance with the provisions of this section. Records so maintained shall not be open for general or public use or inspection.

"(g) Any person, partnership, company, or corporation who shall require any seaman employed or applying for employment to possess, produce, or carry a continuous discharge book, if and when such seaman possesses or carries an identification certificate, or to carry an identification certificate, if and when such seaman possesses and carries a continuous discharge book, or who shall exchange or give to any other person, partnership, company, or corporation information to cause discrimination against a seaman for electing to carry either an identification certificate or a continuous discharge book, or to prevent a seaman from obtaining employment on that account, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and, on conviction thereof, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, at the discretion of the court.

"Seamen shall apply for certificates of identification of continuous discharge books hereunder; and if any application contains any statement known by the applicant to be false, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, on conviction thereof before any district court of the United States, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, in the discretion of the court.

"(h) In case of the loss of a continuous discharge book, a certificate of identification, or of any certificate of discharge by shipwreck or other casualty, the seaman shall be supplied with a duplicate of such continuous discharge book, certificate of identification, or certificate of discharge in which shall be entered all data that may be available from the copies of records kept by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation. In other cases of loss the seaman may obtain a duplicate of such continuous discharge book, certificate of identification, or certificates of discharge, containing the same entries, upon a payment of a sum equivalent to the cost thereof to the Government to be determined from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce.

"(i) The provisions of this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts.

"(j) The Secretary of Commerce shall enforce this section as to all vessels of the United States subject to the provisions hereof through collectors of customs and other Government officers acting under the direction of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and shall make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(k) Where vessels are required to sign on and discharge the crew before a shipping commissioner and no shipping commissioner is appointed or is available the functions and duties required by subsections (d) and (e) of this section to be performed by such shipping commissioner may be performed by a collector or deputy collector of customs; and where vessels are not required to sign on and discharge the crew before a shipping commissioner the duties and functions required by subsections (d) and (e) of this section to be performed by the shipping commissioner shall be performed by the master of such vessel. Any master who shall fail to perform such duties or functions shall be fined in the sum of $50 for each offense."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect as to vessels within the provisions of section 4551 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, as follows: (a) Upon its enactment in the case of such vessels engaged in foreign or intercoastal voyages, and (b) on June 25, 1937, in the case of all other such vessels: Provided, That, until June 25, 1937, the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized, pending the issuance of permanent certificates of identification and permanent certificates of discharge under such section, to provide for temporary certificates of identification and temporary certificates of discharge, which shall have the same force and effect as the permanent certificates.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the House committee be printed in the RECORD following the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the report (No. 200), submitted by Mr. COPELAND on March 17, 1937, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5487) to amend section 4551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 46, sec. 643), having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment.

[H. Rept. No. 381, 75th Cong., 1st sess.]

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5487) to amend section 4551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 46, sec. 643), having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House with the following amendments and, as so amended, recommend that the bill do pass.

The amendments proposed by your committee are as follows:

(1) Page 4, line 18, after the word "seaman", insert the following new sentence: "Records of service entered in either continuous-discharge books or certificates of discharge shall contain no reference to the character or ability of the seaman."

(2) Page 4, line 18, strike out the language beginning with the word "where" through the word "commissioner" in line 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The shipping commissioner shall issue such certificate of discharge and make the proper entries therein, which certificate shall be signed by the seaman to whom it is issued and the master of the vessel, and shall be witnessed by such shipping commissioner."

After the word "That", on page 7, line 20, insert the words "until June 25, 1937,".

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENTS

The purpose of amendment no. 1 is to make certain that no entries shall be made in either the continuous discharge book or certificates of discharge except those specifically directed by law and to provide as affirmative law that no entry in either the continuous discharge book or the certificate of discharge shall contain a reference to the character or ability of the seaman.

The purpose of amendment no. 2 is to make clear that the shipping commissioner is to issue the certificates of discharge and to make the required entries therein.

It is provided by amendment no. 3 that where vessels are required to sign on and discharge the crew before a shipping commissioner and no shipping commissioner is appointed or is available, the functions and duties required by subsections (d) and (e) to be performed by such shipping commissioner may be performed by a collector or deputy collector of customs. In the event that vessels are not required to sign on and discharge the crew before a shipping commissioner, the duties are to be performed by the master of the vessel. This second amendment, coupled with the third amendment, makes certain that there are always available persons authorized to perform the duties incident to certificates of discharge.

The substance and purpose of the third amendment is explained largely in the explanation given of the preceding amendment. In addition this amendment eliminates repetition in subsections (d) and (e) by deleting certain language in those subsections and inserting this amendment as a general provision applicable to both subsections. It is appropriate to state that this amendment allows the collector and deputy collector of customs to perform the duties of the shipping commissioner when the shipping commissioner is not available and requires the master to perform the duties in those cases where existing law does not require that the crew be signed on or discharged before a shipping commissioner. This conforms with the existing law (R. S. 4504), which provides in part as follows:

"Whenever the master of any vessel shall engage his crew or any part of the same in any collection district where no shipping commissioner shall have been appointed, he may perform for himself the duties of such commissioner."

PURPOSE OF LEGISLATION

The purpose of amendment no. 4 is to provide a limit to the time when the temporary certificates of identification and temporary certificates of discharge shall be permitted.

The purpose of the proposed bill is to meet conditions arising by reason of the enactment of section 3 of Public, No. 808, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved June 25, 1936. That law required a book to be known as a continuous discharge book to be carried by every seaman upon a merchant vessel of the United States of the burden of 100 gross tons or upward, except vessels employed exclusively in trade on the navigable rivers of the United States. Public, No. 808, also excepted fishing and whaling vessels and yachts.

Continuous discharge books have been issued to the extent of approximately 50,000 in the various ports of the United States. However, many thousands of seamen and various organizations have protested the use of these books, claiming that the information contained in these books may be used in blacklisting seamen who may undertake, or have undertaken, through strikes or in other ways to improve their conditions or to correct grievances, or who have sailed on ships suffering casualties for which they individually are in no wise responsible, or in other ways and for other causes. The conflicting views have aroused passion, intensified misunderstandings, occasioned stagnation in marine transportation through certain ports, encouraged strikes, interrupted service, and resulted in a general embarrassment of certain services in marine transportation. Many objections which have been urged to company books and service records in the past have been considered as applicable to the discharge book authorized in Public, No. 808. Your committee has been confronted with a problem for which a solution has become imperative. They have been met with a condition that needed correction. They present the proposed bill as a practical answer to the objections raised without losing the benefits sought to be obtained by the original bill.

A resolution was introduced for the repeal of section 3 of Public, No. 808, but as that act had served to repeal existing law, it was necessary to consider legislation which would secure the primary objectives contemplated by the original legislation and which would meet the objections urged to the existing law whether these objections were well founded or not. Your committee held hearings for many days and heard many witnesses. The situation was so serious that your committee sought a basis of agreement which would secure the original purposes of the law to promote safety at sea, which would be free from the objections urged against section 3 of Public, No. 808, and which would meet the conflicting views and sentiments of the witnesses and organizations represented at the hearing.

The principal objective of section 3 of Public, No. 808, was to promote safety at sea by abolishing the old discharges granted seamen which formed the basis of employment on the sea. These old discharges had no adequate identifying features, and in many instances had been forged, bartered, altered, and sold. Many thousands of the continuous discharge books which were authorized by section 3 of Public, No. 808, Seventy-fourth Congress, and which were substituted for the old discharge certificates have been accepted. These had to be protected. Many thousands of seamen fearful of the discharge books had refused them, and if they were to return to work, some alternative method of identification became necessary.

Accordingly, a plan has been worked out by your committee whereby an option is given the seamen either to accept the continuous discharge book or a certificate of identification, the book or certificate to be retained by the seaman to whom it is furnished, and to contain the signature of the seaman to whom it is furnished, a statement of his nationality, his age, personal description, photograph, thumb print, and home address. Such books or certificates are required to be issued by the shipping commissioners or, at ports where no shipping commissioners have been appointed, by collectors or deputy collectors of customs or United States local inspectors of steam vessels, in such manner and form as the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall determine.

Any person, corporation, or association other than a shipping commissioner or collector or deputy collector of customs or United States local inspector of steam vessels, who shall issue or cause to be issued any such book or certificate or imitation of either, or who makes any statement or endorsement in any such book or certificate not authorized by the law shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned for not less than 1 month nor more than 3 months, in the discretion of the court.

Any person applying for such book or certificate and claiming to be a citizen of the United States shall furnish satisfactory evidence of such citizenship. No seaman shall be employed on any vessel to which the section applies unless he has a certificate of identification or a continuous discharge book, except that when it becomes necessary to secure replacements in a foreign port the continuous discharge book or certificate will not be required, but the seaman will secure such continuous discharge book or certificate of identification at the first port of entry in the United States touched by the vessel after hiring the seaman in the foreign port. The data required to be entered upon a discharge book, if the seaman carries one, is the same as required in section 3 of Public, No. 808, except that (a) the seaman's thumb print is required; (b) an intercoastal voyage as well as foreign or coastwise is expressly required to be shown; and (c) it is expressly stated that "nothing more" shall be shown than the data specifically required in the statute. If the seaman elects to carry a certificate of identification, then the certificate of identification must show the same information as required in the continuous discharge book, but no entries of voyages and discharges are to be shown in the certificate of identification. In these cases a separate certificate of discharge is required to be printed on durable paper, which shall contain the name and citizenship of the seaman to whom it is furnished, the serial number of the certificate of identification, the name and official number of the vessel, the nature of the voyage (foreign, intercoastal, or coastwise), the class to which the vessel belongs, date and place of shipment and of discharge of the seaman, and the rating then held by the seaman. These certificates of discharge are required to be signed by the seaman and master of the vessel, and, if the seaman is discharged before a shipping commissioner, or collector or deputy collector of customs, shall be witnessed by such official. The original certificate shall be delivered to the seaman and a certified copy transmitted to the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

It is expressly provided that the records of service entered in either continuous discharge books or certificates of discharge shall contain no reference to the character or ability of the seaman, and that the records in Washington shall not be open to public information. In order to meet the fear of possible blacklisting against any seaman, either those taking the discharge books or those taking the certificates of identification and discharge, special provisions are inserted which it is believed will prevent such a result.

As some question had arisen as to the correct interpretation of the word "rating" as it appears in the statute, the proposed bill affirmatively shows that this word has reference only to the capacity in which the seaman is employed on the ship.

The records required to be kept in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation are made applicable to certificates of identification and other certificates issued under this act as well as to the discharge books. Protection is afforded against loss of certificates of identification or certificates of discharge similar to the protection afforded to the continuous-discharge books.

In order to provide the same effective dates for different classes of vessels as contained in section 3 of Public, No. 808, section 2 of the proposed bill is written so that as to vessels engaged in foreign or intercoastal voyages, the proposed bill goes into effect upon its passage. As to all other vessels covered by section 4551 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, it goes into effect on June 25, 1937. In other words, the proposed bill covers the same vessels and provides the same effective dates as section 3 of Public, No. 808, Seventy-fourth Congress. However, the continuous-discharge books have been printed and distributed. They are immediately available, but the alternative certificates of identification and certificates of discharge are not available. Therefore, in order to prevent any discrimination, and to cover the period when these certificates may be available, it is provided that the Secretary of Commerce until June 25, 1937, is authorized, pending the issuance of permanent certificates of identification and permanent certificates of discharge under this section, to provide for temporary certificates of identification and temporary certificates of discharge which shall have the same force and effect as the permanent certificates.

The committee is advised that temporary certificates may be made available immediately.

Great credit is due Mr. Joseph B. Weaver, Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, for his excellent and effective services in working out the solution as presented in the proposed bill.

The bill has the support of the Department of Commerce, the Department of Labor, and represents the views of the representatives of the principal labor organizations appearing before the committee. It is urged that the bill may be immediately enacted into law.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

In compliance with paragraph 2a of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, changes in section 4551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of June 25, 1936 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 46, sec. 643), made by this bill are shown as follows: Existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets; new matter is printed in italics; existing law in which no change is proposed is shown in roman.

"SEC. 4551. (a) Every seaman upon a merchant vessel of the United States of the burden of 100 gross tons or upward, except vessels employed exclusively in trade on the navigable rivers of the United States, shall be [furnished with a book to be known as a 'continuous discharge book', which shall be retained by him and which] furnished, at the option of the seaman, with a book to be known as a continuous discharge book or with a certificate of identification, which book or certificate shall be retained by the seaman and shall contain the signature of the seaman to whom it is so furnished and a statement of his nationality, age, personal description, photograph, thumb prints, and home address. Such books or certificates shall be [in such form and] issued by the shipping [commissioners and collectors and] commissioners, or, at ports where no shipping commissioners have been appointed, by collectors or deputy collectors of customs [at ports where no shipping commissioners have been appointed] or United States local inspectors of steam vessels, in such manner and form as the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall determine. [Any person, corporation, or association other than a shipping commissioner, or collector or deputy collector of customs, who shall issue or cause to be issued any such book or imitation thereof, or any person, other than the real owner, who uses or endeavors to use any such book, or who makes any statement or endorsement in any such book not herein authorized.] Any individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association which shall issue any such book or certificate, or make any statement or endorsement therein, except as authorized by the provisions of this section, or issue any imitation of any such book or certificate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not less than 1 month nor more than 3 months, in the discretion of the court.

"(b) Any person applying for such book or certificate and claiming to be a citizen of the United States shall furnish satisfactory evidence of such citizenship.

"(c) No seaman shall be employed on any vessel to which this section applies until he has exhibited a certificate of identification or a continuous discharge book to the shipping commissioner, or in cases where seamen are not signed on before the shipping commissioner, to the master of the vessel: Provided, That the provisions of this subsection shall not apply to the employment of seamen at a foreign port or place, in which case seamen so employed shall be furnished a continuous discharge book or a certificate of identification, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, at the first port of entry in the United States or its Territories at which the vessel arrives after such seamen are so employed.

"[(b)] (d) Upon the discharge of any seaman and the payment of his wages, the shipping commissioner shall enter in the continuous discharge book of such [seaman] seaman, if the seaman carries such a book, the name and official number of the vessel, the nature of the voyage ([foreign] foreign, intercoastal, or coastwise), the class to which the vessel belongs (steam, motor, sail, or barge), the date and place of the shipment and of the discharge of such seaman, [and] the rating (capacity in which employed) then held by such seaman, and the signature of the person making such entries and nothing more. [Whenever a seaman is discharged in any collection district where no shipping commissioner has been appointed, the master of the vessel shall perform the duties of such commissioner and shall make the proper entries in such continuous discharge book; and when the seamen are not required by law to be signed on and discharged before a shipping commissioner, the master shall make such proper entries in the discharge book. Any master who fails to make such entries shall be fined the sum of $50 for each such offense. This subsection shall take effect as to vessels engaged in foreign and intercoastal voyages 6 months after the enactment of this act and as to all other vessels within 1 year after the enactment of this act.]

"(e) For the purpose of furnishing evidence of sea service in the case of seamen preferring the certificate of identification instead of the continuous discharge book, the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation shall provide a certificate of discharge, printed on durable paper, in such form as to specify the name and citizenship of the seaman to whom it is issued, the serial number of his certificate of identification, the name and official number of the vessel, the nature of the voyage (foreign, intercoastal, or coastwise), the class to which the vessel belongs (steam, motor, sail, or barge), the date and place of the shipment and of the discharge of such seaman, and the rating) capacity in which employed) then held by such seaman. Records of service entered in either continuous discharge books or certificates of discharge shall contain no reference to the character or ability of the seaman. The shipping commissioner shall issue such certificate of discharge and make the proper entries therein, which certificate shall be signed by the seaman to whom it is issued and the master of the vessel and shall be witnessed by such shipping commissioner.

"[(c)] (f) There shall be maintained in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation in Washington, District of Columbia, a record of every continuous discharge [book and] book, certificate of identification, certificate of discharge, and any other certificate issued [under the provisions of this act,] by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, together with the name and address of the seaman to whom it is [issued, his next of kin, and a certified copy of all discharge entries in such book, which copy shall be forwarded to such Bureau by the shipping commissioner or person duly authorized to act as such before whom such holder is discharged] issued and of his next of kin, and certified copies of all entries made in continuous discharge books or certificates of discharge, which entries shall be forwarded to the Bureau by the shipping commissioner or other person making such entries in accordance with the provisions of this section. Records so maintained shall not be open for general or public use or inspection.

"(g) Any person, partnership, company, or corporation who shall require any seaman employed or applying for employment to pos- sess, produce, or carry a continuous discharge book, if and when such seaman possesses or carries an identification certificate, or to carry an identification certificate, if and when such seaman possesses and carries a continuous discharge book, or who shall exchange or give to any other person, partnership, company, or corporation information to cause discrimination against a seaman for electing to carry either an identification certificate or a continuous discharge book, or to prevent a seaman from obtaining employment on that account, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and, on conviction thereof, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, at the discretion of the court.

"Seamen shall apply for certificates of identification or continuous discharge books hereunder; and if any application contains any statement known by the applicant to be false, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, on conviction thereof before any district court of the United States, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, in the discretion of the court.

"[(d) In case of the loss of a book by shipwreck or other casualty the seaman shall be supplied with another discharge book, in which shall be entered all data contained in the last book so far as this may be available from copies of records kept by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation; in other cases of loss the seaman may obtain a duplicate of such book containing the same entries upon payment of a sum equivalent to the cost thereof to the Government, to be determined from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce.]

"(h) In case of the loss of a continuous discharge book, a certificate of identification, or of any certificate of discharge by shipwreck or other casualty, the seaman shall be supplied with a duplicate of such continuous discharge book, certificate of identification, or certificate of discharge, in which shall be entered all data that may be available from the copies of records kept by the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation. In other cases of loss the seaman may obtain a duplicate of such continuous discharge book, certificate of identification, or certificate of discharge, containing the same entries, upon a payment of a sum equivalent to the cost of the Government, to be determined from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce.

"(i) The provisions of this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts.

"(j) The Secretary of Commerce shall enforce this section as to all vessels of the United States subject to the provisions hereof through collectors of customs and other Government officers acting under the direction of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and shall make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(k) Where vessels are required to sign on and discharge the crew before a shipping commissioner and no shipping commissioner is appointed or is available the functions and duties required by subsections (d) and (e) of this section to be performed by such shipping commissioner may be performed by a collector or deputy collector of customs; and where vessels are not required to sign on and discharge the crew before a shipping commissioner the duties and functions required by subsections (d) and (e) of this section to be performed by the shipping commissioner shall be performed by the master of such vessel. Any master who shall fail to perform such duties or functions shall be fined in the sum of $50 for each offense."

RED RIVER OF THE NORTH

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1570) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, and North Dakota with respect to the Red River of the North, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, and North Dakota to negotiate and enter into compacts or agreements providing for the utilization of, the control of the floods of, and the prevention of pollution of, the waters of the Red River of the North and streams tributary thereto.

SEC. 2. Such consent is given upon condition that a representative of the United States, to be appointed by the President, shall participate in the negotiations and shall make report to Congress of the proceedings and of any compact or agreement entered into. Other than for the compensation and expenses of such representative, the United States shall not be liable for any expenses in connection with any of such negotiations, compacts, or agreements.

SEC. 3. No such compact or agreement shall be binding or obligatory upon any of such States unless and until it has been approved by the legislature of each of such States.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had intended to address an inquiry regarding this bill to the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who reported the bill, but apparently he is absent from the Chamber. The author of the bill, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], is present; and I ask him to explain the nature of the compacts referred to in the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the bill merely grants the consent of Congress for compacts to be entered into by the three States of Minnesota, South Dakota, and North Dakota for the utilization, control, and prevention of pollution of the waters of the Red River of the North—just the one river on the border. The river rises between South Dakota and Minnesota, and then runs for the full length of North Dakota between North Dakota and Minnesota. It runs north of Lake Winnipeg.

The water is needed for the use of the cities along the Red River on both sides. The level of the water is very low, and it is desired that the three States may be authorized to act together to conserve the water and to work out a program for the benefit of the towns along the valleys.

Mr. ROBINSON. It will be observed that by section 3 it is required that any compact or agreement, to be binding upon any of the States, must be approved by the legislature of each of the States.

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes. The compact has been approved by the North Dakota Legislature and, I understand, by the Minnesota Legislature. I am not sure about the South Dakota Legislature, but I understood there was no objection from any of the legislatures, and that they desired to have the measure passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. In any event, before the compact becomes binding it will have to be approved by the legislature of each of the States.

Mr. FRAZIER. Oh, yes; it must be approved by the legislature of each State. The bill also provides that the Government shall have one representative on the board or committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH N. WENGER, UNITED STATES NAVY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 274) for the relief of Joseph N. Wenger, lieutenant, United States Navy, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment at the end of the bill to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of Joseph N. Wenger, lieutenant, United States Navy, as provided in section 12 of the act of May 18, 1920 (41 Stat. 604; U. S. C., title 10, sec. 756), for $494.57 as reimbursement of the cost of commercial transportation of his wife from Washington, D. C., to Manila, P. I., pursuant to change-of-station orders dated April 19, 1933, there not being reasonably available Government transportation for his wife between said stations. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum not exceeding $494.57 for payment of the claim: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGES FOR NINTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT

The bill (S. 1550) to provide for the appointment of two additional circuit judges for the ninth judicial circuit was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, two additional circuit judges for the ninth judicial circuit.

RELIEF TO PERSONS ERRONEOUSLY CONVICTED

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 750) to grant relief to persons erroneously convicted in courts of the United States, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who, having been convicted of any crime or offense against the United States, shall hereafter, on appeal from the judgment of conviction or on the retrial or rehearing of his case, be found to have been innocent of the crime with which he was charged and not guilty of any other offense against the United States, or who after inquiry by the Executive has received a pardon on the ground of innocence, may, under the conditions hereinafter mentioned, apply by petition for indemnification for the pecuniary injury he has sustained through his erroneous conviction and/or imprisonment.

SEC. 2. That the claimant may, within 6 months after he has been finally acquitted or pardoned on the ground of innocence, petition the Court of Claims for the relief granted in this act.

SEC. 3. That the court is hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations, consistent with the law, for executing the provisions hereof.

SEC. 4. That the claimant shall have the burden of proving his innocence, in that he must show that the act with which he was charged was not committed at all, or, if committed, was not committed by the accused.

SEC. 5. That the claimant must show that he has not, either intentionally or by willful misconduct or negligence, contributed to bring about his arrest or conviction.

SEC. 6. That the Court of Claims shall examine the validity and amount of all claims included within the terms of this act; they shall receive all suitable testimony on oath or affirmation and all other proper evidence; and they shall report all such conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the right to relief.

SEC. 7. That upon proof satisfactory to the Court of Claims that the claim is prima facie meritorious and that the claimant is unable to advance the costs of court and of process, the cost of obtaining and printing the record of the original proceedings and of securing the attendance of such witnesses as the chief justice or the presiding judge of the Court of Claims shall certify to be necessary, and the service of all notices required by this act, shall be paid out of any unappropriated funds in the Treasury, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a duly authenticated order, certified by the clerk of the Court of Claims and signed by the chief justice or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court.

SEC. 8. That the court shall cause notice of all petitions presented under this act to be served on the Attorney General of the United States, who shall be authorized, by himself or his assistant, to examine witnesses, to cause testimony to be taken, to have access to all testimony taken under this act, and to be heard by the court. He shall resist all claims presented under this act by all proper legal defenses.

SEC. 9. That the Court of Claims in granting or refusing the relief demanded shall take into consideration all the circumstances of the case which may defeat or in any other way affect the right to and the amount of the relief herein provided for, but in no case shall the relief granted exceed $5,000.

SEC. 10. That in all cases of final judgments by the Court of Claims the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general or special appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims on presentation to Congress and to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment, certified by the clerk of the Court of Claims, and signed by the chief justice or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think there should be an explanation of this bill. On its face it appears to be a meritorious proposal.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I may possibly be able to satisfy the Senator in reference to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know that there is any objection to the bill, but I think the Senate should be informed about it.

Mr. MALONEY. I do not think there will be any objection to the bill. I sincerely regret that the chairman of the subcommittee which considered the bill is absent, and more sincerely regret that the file of material which I had on the bill is in his possession, and I did not have a chance to obtain it this morning.

The report accompanying the bill, in my opinion, clearly sets forth the serious need for providing, as is done by the bill, an opportunity for persons who are definitely erroneously convicted to secure from the Government redress to the amount of $5,000. It is a subject which has had considerable attention from many interested and important persons; and, as the report accompanying the bill points out, it has had the special study of Prof. Edward M. Borchard, of Yale University Law School. He is the man who interested me in the subject on which he has written articles and at least one book. He points out that never heretofore has the Federal Government provided a way for the man who was clearly erroneously convicted and sentenced for a crime he did not commit to make an appeal and secure redress. The bill provides that in such circumstances one who is able to prove that the alleged crime was never committed or that he did not have anything to do with the crime, may go to the Court of Claims and seek redress up to the amount of $5,000. In its present form the bill has the approval of the Attorney General of the United States and the Department of Justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the consideration in regular order of unobjected bills on the calendar.

JOSEPH M. CACACE AND OTHERS

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to Order of Business 201, being Senate bill 470, about which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] requested an explanation. At the time I did not notice exactly what the bill provided.

A recognizance in the sum of $10,000 was executed by those for whom the bill was introduced. Through some kind of a hoax—I do not remember just what—the man for whose appearance the bond was posted disappeared, but he was returned without any cost to the Government, and was convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary. The Attorney General has twice recommended the payment of the amount asked by the bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator's explanation is entirely satisfactory to me, and I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection the bill (S. 470) for the relief of Joseph M. Cacace, Charles M. Cacace, and Mary E. Clibourne was considered ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

That said Joseph M. Cacace, Charles M. Cacace, and Mary E. Clibourne be, and are hereby, relieved from liability for the payment of said judgment so entered in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, at Norfolk; that said judgment be and is hereby canceled; and that the United States attorney for the eastern district of Virginia be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to so mark said judgment canceled of record.

The preamble was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, on the 20th day of November 1934, John T. Cacace was convicted of an offense and was thereupon admitted to bail in the penalty of $10,000 pending his motion for a new trial, and executed a recognizance for said sum with Joseph M. Cacace, Charles M. Cacace, and Mary E. Clibourne, his brothers and sister, as sureties; and

Whereas on the 23d of November 1934, said John T. Cacace without the knowledge, consent, or connivance of said sureties, willfully defaulted by leaving the jurisdiction and failed to appear on November 26, the time appointed for the hearing of his motion for a new trial, whereupon he was declared in default and on motion of the United States, by its attorney, a scire facias issued on said date returnable on November 30, on which last-named date the court declined to give the sureties on said bond additional time for the purpose of attempting to produce said convict but forfeited said bond and entered judgment against the stipulators for the sum of $10,000 and costs; and

Whereas on December 6, 1934, the said John T. Cacace voluntarily surrendered himself to the marshal of the district and was thereafter sentenced and is now serving his term in a penitentiary designated by the court; and

Whereas the sureties on said recognizance filed their petition in said court on December 8, 1934, praying that said judgment might be set aside and the forfeiture remitted, which prayer has been refused by the court upon the ground that under the statute in such case made and provided it had no discretion where the default was willful; and

Whereas by the voluntary appearance and the sentencing of said convict the ends of justice have been accomplished without additional expense to the Government so that nothing further is to be gained by the enforcement of said judgment, which enforcement will cause said stipulators to lose their homes by foreclosure under execution: Now, therefore.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5232, making appropriations for the Naval Establishment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5232) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BYRNES. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it is the intention to proceed with its consideration and have it passed this afternoon?

Mr. BYRNES. Of course, I cannot anticipate how long the bill will be discussed. I may state to the Senator that there was no controversy in the Committee on Appropriations over the bill as reported. The bill makes a reduction of $51,000,000 below the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget sent to the Congress by the President. I do not think there will be much controversy over the bill, but of course I cannot anticipate how long it will be under discussion in the Senate.

Mr. FRAZIER. I note that the Senate committee has reduced the amount appropriated in the bill as passed by the House by a little over $3,707,000. For one, I have not had time or opportunity to read the bill as reported. It was not on the calendar. In fact, I did not know it was to be taken up today until the middle of the forenoon, and I telephoned for a copy of the bill as reported to the Senate, but it did not reach my office until 10 minutes before 12. So I have not had time to examine the bill. I do not know that any good would be accomplished by a discussion of the measure, but I desired to have that privilege, and I should like to have the bill go over until Monday.

Mr. BYRNES. I know the Senator's views on the questions involved in this measure, in a way, and I know he will derive some comfort from the fact that the bill not only reduces the estimate of the Budget by $51,000,000, but reduces the appropriation below that of the current year by $15,000,000. In addition, there is the unusual situation of the Senate committee reducing the amount carried by the bill below the amount agreed to by the House. Only a few changes have been made in the bill passed by the House, and I know the Senator is familiar with that bill. I think if he would examine the report he would find that not many material alterations have been made in the measure as it passed the House.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what were the items that were changed? In what items was there a reduction of $15,000,000?

Mr. BYRNES. The changes constituted so many items that I could not enumerate them all. The House reduced the appropriation below the estimate of the Budget by quite a large amount. The reduction recommended by the Senate committee was below the figure of the House bill by only about $3,700,000. The House, by its action, reduced the appropriation below the amount estimated by the Budget in the approximate amount of $45,000,000, and that covered all of the various activities of the Naval Establishment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I appreciate the fact that the Senate committee has reduced the amount of the appropriation provided by the other House, and that as it passed the House the bill carried less than the recommendation of the Budget, or of the Navy Department; but the bill carries over half a billion dollars, and I know that there are quite a number of Senators who agree with me that it might be reduced still more. It seems almost preposterous that our Government should spend $512,000,000 for naval purposes at this time, and I should like very much to have an opportunity to study the bill and speak on it a little, but thus far I have not had time to familiarize myself with the provisions of the measure.

Mr. BYRNES. I hope the Senator will prepare any amendments he would like to offer and present them today, because, as I stated to the Senator a few moments ago, the bill does not make any material change in the bill as it passed the House, and with that bill I am sure the Senator is familiar. It was discussed at some length upon the floor of the House, and many amendments were offered. A mere glance at the report would convince the Senator that there are no very material changes in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I appreciate the difficulties which attend the filing of a report during a recess of the Senate. On nearly every occasion when such a request has been made I have objected to that procedure. It does not afford the Members of the Senate who are not present at the time the agreement is entered into ample notice of the time when a bill is to be taken up for consideration. In the present case I made an exception in order that there might be a recess over yesterday. For my part, I am willing to consider the bill at this time, but two Senators on the Republican side of the Senate have complained that they have not had sufficient time to study the measure and were not until this morning apprised of the fact that the bill would come up for consideration today.

Of course, the Senator from South Carolina is within the rules; the bill could properly be brought up today; and a motion has been made to make it the order of business. But it is only a matter of courtesy on the part of the very courteous Senator from South Carolina to consider the plea made by the Senator from North Dakota.

I do not know whether or not there is any unfinished business for Monday, but I think not, and I am just wondering whether a delay of 2 days would in any way interfere with the Naval Establishment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from South Carolina and to the Senator from Oregon that they get together and see if they cannot agree upon the procedure on the naval appropriation bill. They can do that while I discuss another subject during the pendency of the bill now before the Senate. They will have ample time to do it while I discuss that measure.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Senator from Louisiana desires to proceed at this time, and that will be agreeable to me, although I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate.

SIT-DOWN STRIKE

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I hesitate further to precipitate debate on the question of the so-called sit-down strikes. Last Wednesday three distinguished Members of this body called attention to the problem confronting our Nation because of the existence and the continuous application of this new method of attack on the part of some labor leaders in their desire to force employers to meet their demands.

It will be recalled that when the first sit-down strike was in effect at the General Motors plant at Detroit a Senate resolution was offered which called for an investigation of General Motors. It was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, of which committee I am privileged to be a member. In the midst of the strike a hearing on the resolution was requested, and the committee granted it. A few witnesses were called. I took the position that I did not think the time was opportune for the hearing, because should the Senate show a willingness to take a stand in the strike one way or the other, it might give rise to a forlorn hope to those at whose instance the hearing was being held, and thereby prolong the strike indefinitely. Fortunately, further hearings were not had on the resolution, the strike was settled, and it is my understanding that no further effort has been made to have hearings on the resolution.

In discussing this matter, I desire to have it well understood that because of lack of information I am not prepared to judge which of the two contending factions is wrong, or, may I say, that the demands of the strikers may be entirely justified, but I do mean to assert and to declare unhesitatingly to the Senate, to those engaged in the strike, and to the American people, that the sit-down strike method is abhorrent to me, is un-American, is nothing short of a hold-up, and should be no longer tolerated.

I have always been in favor of labor unions. During my entire public career I have stood by them, and am now willing to stand by them in their fight in their efforts to secure for their membership just, fair, and reasonable treatment. In the past, labor unions, in most cases, have fought their battles against employers in a lawful and gentlemanly way. Demands were made far in advance of the call of a contemplated strike, thereby giving the employer an opportunity of determining the reasonableness and fairness of the demands. In many instances the demands were met; in others, they were arbitrated and finally settled to the satisfaction of all parties concerned; and in few instances were force and violence resorted to in order to enforce the demands made.

Today that American method has apparently been abandoned by a group of so-called labor leaders. I say so-called because they do not seem to desire to emulate the methods resorted to by past leaders. They are to me more in the nature of agitators and bullies who feel that they can trample over the property rights of the citizens of our Nation, and thereby get results. I have no sympathy for such methods. Mr. President and Senators, just think of a group of workmen in a factory, apparently content and at peace with their employers, and all of a sudden they desire to take possession of their employers' property and remain in possession thereof until their demands, whether just or not, are met. Such persons are trespassers. They violate the very bill of rights provided for in our Constitution. Such persons have no more right to retain possession of their employer's property than would I have a right to go in their respective homes and take possession of their houses, furniture, and fixtures. The mere fact that their employer may not be treating them justly does not afford them such rights. Better would it be for the group to stand together, make their demands known, and refuse to work until their demands, if just, are met.

I, of course, sympathize with the strikers themselves. What is distasteful to me is the method used by their leaders. Their demands may be just. I am conscious of grave injustices to labor that do now exist in many of the factories, the workshops, and mines of our Nation. Our party has made every effort to remedy the situation, but without much success up to this time. It is to be hoped that in the near future a plan can be worked out whereby both labor and capital may legally be called upon to coordinate their efforts in order to make America a greater and better place in which to live.

Mr. President, again I say to you, I sympathize with the workingman, I sympathize with these strikers, but I am against the methods employed by their leaders. I cannot believe that the strikers are responsible for the method now in vogue. I blame their leaders. I blame those who agitate such a procedure. I blame those who take advantage of the circumstances that are now confronting our Nation and lead these hard-working men in the path of wrong and illegal means. Should the worst happen and blood be spilled, I for one will point the finger of scorn and condemnation at those agitators and leaders who are responsible, in my judgment, for the situation. Mr. President, can you imagine a labor leader who professes to be an American, wedded to American ideals, fostering and being, in my opinion, responsible for such a condition? Can you imagine an American labor leader who will not resent the defiance of a solemn order that was recently issued by a court of one of our sovereign States? His silence, in my opinion, condones everything that has been done so far; and I now call upon him to get back to his senses and stop this un-American method, lest it lead us into the depths of strife, conflict, and bloodshed.

I do not know who is responsible for this. I am told that John L. Lewis is the leader of the movement. If Mr. Lewis is, I brand him as a traitor to American ideals and a menace to the peace and prosperity of our Nation.

I sympathize with Governor Murphy of Michigan. It may be that he exercised too much leniency when this un-American method was first resorted to. I know the Governor very well. He is very sympathetic by nature, and his sole purpose was, I believe, to prevent the shedding of blood during the strike.

In connection with my remarks, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Washington Post this morning dealing with the subject I have just discussed, and particularly with reference to the statement I have just made concerning Governor Murphy.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Mar. 19, 1937]

GOVERNOR MURPHY'S STATEMENT

Governor Murphy has made a heroic effort to avoid errors of either omission or commission in the exceedingly dangerous situation which the sit-down strikes of automobile workers have precipitated in Michigan. If any criticism is to be made of his attitude it is that in his anxiety to avoid bloodshed he has given tacit encouragement to a definitely revolutionary movement which obviously cannot be allowed to continue unchecked. That leniency, however, gives added force to the statement he made at the opening of his "law and order conference" on Wednesday.

In this statement the Governor squarely confronted the intolerable threat to orderly government contained in the seizure of factories, and their continued occupation after clear-cut judicial rulings on the illegality of this procedure. "We have means to enforce respect for public authority", said the Governor, "and we propose to use them with proper vigor if need be."

Everyone hopes that the resort to force will not be necessary. Everyone hopes that the Chrysler factories will be evacuated peacefully before the legal steps necessitating compliance with Judge Campbell's order have been completed. But if force is necessary, force will have to be used. That possibility must be confronted calmly and without equivocation. Otherwise the eventual settlement will be far more difficult and far more disastrous for the general welfare.

Governor Murphy attributes to the policies of "backward employers" much of the responsibility for the present excited tactics of the automobile-workers union. But he is under no misapprehension as to what is at stake in the present coercive methods of the latter. "When the authority of governmental agencies is continually flouted or defied", he says, "outraged citizens prepare to take the law into their own hands; democratic rule is endangered, and the way is prepared for the rule of mobs or dictators."

On the leaders of the men camped in the Chrysler factories at Detroit rests a greater responsibility than they seem to realize. They have a case, but they are risking the loss of it in the great court of public opinion. And they risk much more than their own case. Present "intolerable conditions", as Governor Murphy says, will be remedied by "another kind of rule" if the accepted procedure of our form of government cannot be peacefully maintained.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, as I said in my opening remarks, I do not have so much in the way of facts at this time; but I propose to obtain the facts, and at a future time I expect to discuss the subject, and shall ask the further indulgence of the Senate.

FLOOD-PREVENTION EFFECT OF DAMS IN TENNESSEE VALLEY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, recently the representatives of private power companies of the United States have indulged in spreading a false and, it seems to me, in some respects at least, a malicious propaganda in regard to the effect, if any, that the activities of the T. V. A. in the Tennessee River Valley have had in preventing greater damage in that valley than that which occurred in January by reason of the floodwaters in the Ohio River. The matter had its origin, as I understand, in a statement made by the President of the United States in a speech he delivered on the fourth day of the present month.

In that speech the President said:

During the course of the past 4 years the Nation has been overwhelmed by disasters of flood and drought.

Modern science knows how to protect our land and our people from the recurrence of such catastrophies and knows how to produce as a byproduct the blessings of cheaper electric power. With the Tennessee Valley Authority we made a beginning of that kind of protection on an intelligent regional basis. With only two of its nine projected dams completed, there was no flood damage in the valley of the Tennessee this winter.

I have in my hand a clipping taken from the Washington Post, being an article written by Mr. Franklin Waltman. He discusses a great many other subjects than the flood question, with some of which I am not acquainted, and with some of which I am acquainted. His statement concerning all the matters about which I know anything is either entirely untrue or partially so.

In this article Mr. Waltman, in discussing the President's speech, says:

> The reason why the Tennessee Valley escaped the flood havoc suffered by the Ohio Valley was not due to the T. V. A. but because there was only normal rainfall—4.59 inches—during January at the headwaters of the Tennessee and the Clinch River, which empties into it, whereas from 8 to 20 inches of rain fell in the Ohio Valley.

As I shall show later on, that is an absolutely untruthful statement. It can hardly have been made by accident, because a record is kept of the rainfall all over the United States.

Records are kept at a great many places in the Tennessee Valley, from which the Weather Bureau gives to the country absolute information as to the amount of rainfall. The substance of that article, however, was spread all over the United States. The New York Herald Tribune on March 6 commented editorially as follows:

> It is a small but not insignificant item that the President of the United States cited the absence of flood in the T. V. A. region as proof of the value of these particular dams. The fact that rains were normal in this region was apparently overlooked in his search for the truth.

I have read the Washington Post article of March 6. It was not an editorial; but on March 10, in the editorial columns of the Wall Street Journal, it was said:

> The suggestion that Wilson and Norris Dams recently preserved the Tennessee Valley from floods is entirely incorrect. The truth is that the precipitation in the Tennessee Valley watershed was no more than reasonably normal, and that had it been as excessive as in the case of the Ohio Valley watershed the Wilson and Norris Dams would not have protected the valley from floods.

Similar statements, Mr. President, appear in the Chicago Journal of Commerce and in the Cincinnati Times-Star and in a large number of other newspapers.

I wish to observe, in passing, that the editorial from the Wall Street Journal does not take into consideration another dam, known as the Wheeler Dam, which, as I shall show later, played a very important part in preventing destruction in the Tennessee Valley and also in the Ohio Valley from the mouth of the Tennessee to the Mississippi.

In the article from which I quoted from the Washington Post it is stated:

> Neither the Wilson Dam nor the Norris Dam in the T. V. A. program are flood-control dams. They are hydroelectric dams; that is to say, their purpose presupposes a full dam and an even flow of water.

That is another misstatement, which, I concede, anyone might have been led into on the basis of misinformation; but, as I shall show later, it is not true.

Mr. President, there is another piece of propaganda, a copy of which I hold in my hand, consisting of about eight or nine pages of typewritten matter, which was circulated among newspapermen by Stephen M. Walter, but which is not signed. The facts are that the memorandum which I hold in my hand came from a newspaperman to whom it was given by Mr. Walter. It is a long statement, a good deal like the article from the Post from which I first quoted. It refers to many other things, but it contains a statement about the rainfall in the Tennessee Valley as follows:

> Rainfall in the watershed of the Clinch River, above Norris Dam, which is the only T. V. A. dam that could have served to store floodwater, was normal during and preceding the flood period.

Then he refers to a map which he submitted with the statement, which, on fair examination, I think will really controvert the facts which he has set forth in the memorandum. That statement received a great deal of publicity from newspapers, mostly those which are unfriendly to the T. V. A., and went all over the country.

I talked this morning with a Member of this body who had read the President's statement, and had also read the denial of any excessive rainfall, and he assumed and believed, quite honestly and quite naturally, that in the great flood in the Ohio River the rainfall in the Tennessee Valley was normal. That is a belief which is generally held by the people at large. I have numerous letters written from different sections of the country calling my attention to the terrible statement made by the President by which he tried to mislead the people and make them believe there had been a great amount of rain in the Tennessee Valley, when, as a matter of fact, the letters stated that the rainfall there was normal.

It is, Mr. President, only another illustration of the false, often malicious, propaganda that is circulated by representatives of the private power interests to cause the American people to believe a falsehood, to cause them to believe in a condition that did not exist, to cause them even to question the integrity of the President of the United States when he made that statement.

I am going to refer to the record of the rainfall but, before doing so, I wish to discuss briefly the dams in the Tennessee and its tributaries that were claimed by the friends of the T. V. A. to have a very material effect in preventing damage not only in the Tennessee Valley but in the Ohio Valley from the mouth of the Tennessee to the mouth of the Ohio.

It is said in one criticism which is made that the Norris Dam is of no value as a flood-control measure and it is said, in effect, that the dam cannot be valuable as a flood-control measure and at the same time be of any value for the purposes of power. The Norris Dam, with the reservoir behind it, is just the kind of a work that has great value for flood-control purposes and also very large value as a power producer. It is true that often in the construction of a flood-control dam the dam will have no material value for the purposes of power. That depends entirely upon the reservoir behind the dam and the amount of rainfall in the watershed. If the reservoir created by the dam is only sufficient to hold the largest floods that ever come into a given region, then, it must be entirely emptied after a flood has passed in order to be ready for the next one, but if there be a reservoir that is so large that it will hold much more water than that carried by any flood which has ever been known in history, and still have a large capacity above that, then, it is never necessary to empty the dam in order to protect the country from flood damage.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, I do not see how anybody could disagree with what the Senator says about the subject he is discussing. The Fort Peck Dam——

Mr. NORRIS. That is another illustration.

Mr. WHEELER. Is being built in my own State for the specific purpose of preventing floods on the Missouri, and, incidentally, for irrigation and power purposes. However, the main purpose of it is for flood control and to regulate the flow of the stream at all times for navigation.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. He has given a good illustration, an actual case, where the Government has built another dam which has very large flood-control value. Outside, perhaps, the Colorado River, that is the best example of such a case in the United States, the Norris Dam comes next; and yet at Fort Peck there is going to be produced an immense amount of power.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope so; I am trying to get the administration to do that; but I have not as yet succeeded.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will succeed. It would be an economic sin if advantage should not be taken of the power possibilities at Fort Peck.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator entirely, and I have been trying to get the administration to install power plants there. I think it would be a tremendous loss to the people of that section if that should not be done, because the power could be used for the purpose of pumping water for irrigation upon a vast arid area where at present water is greatly needed.

Mr. NORRIS. The Wheeler Dam is another illustration of a dam having flood-control value and also value for navigation and power. Its flood-control value is not nearly so great as the flood-control value of the Norris Dam. The Wilson Dam——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. The Wilson Dam, 15 miles lower down than the Wheeler Dam, has practically no flood-control value. Such value depends always upon the reservoir, the surrounding country that God himself has made, and the amount of water that comes down. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I am in full accord with what the Senator has said about the particular projects, but of course the same argument would not hold, I assume, as to the reservoirs on the upper reaches of the Ohio River where the topography is such that it would not be possible to have tremendous reservoirs which could be used for the double purpose of flood control and power.

Mr. NORRIS. I could not tell the Senator whether that would be possible in any particular location which I have not studied or the engineers have not examined. It depends in every case upon the conditions surrounding the dam which it is proposed to build.

Mr. COPELAND. In Pennsylvania and New York, at the headwaters of the branches of the Ohio, it would not be possible, in my judgment, in most instances, to develop power. I wish to say, however, that in passing the omnibus flood control bill last year we provided that every dam should have a penstock, so, if at any future time there should be a possibility of power development, it might be undertaken.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me call attention to something I have often commented on in the Senate. Complaint is made about it in some of the articles to which I have referred. That is in regard to Norris Dam. Norris Dam could be operated purely for power purposes. If it were so operated, the water behind the dam would be allowed to accumulate to the height of the dam and would be kept there always. It never would be let out because the natural flow of the stream going over the top of the dam would give the maximum amount of power to be produced due to the height of the water. If a private person had built Norris Dam, that is what would have been done. That is what I would have done if I had built it. I have said many times it would have been an economic sin to let any private corporation or individual build that dam, because its usefulness in relation to flood control would have disappeared.

The Government lost power when it built that large reservoir ready to hold the next flood. If we were merely going to make money out of it and had no other consideration for the people lower down on the river, we would have the reservoir filled all the time.

The T. V. A. will have several such dams to construct where the value of the dam will be related entirely 100 percent to flood control, where they will not put in a penstock or wheel. Where it is known in advance that the capacity of the reservoir behind the dam is sufficient only to hold one big flood, the reservoir will always have to be emptied. When it is empty, of course, there will be no power there. While we could produce power as the water is going out, it would always be secondary power which is of but little value.

Mr. President, I want to refer to the records from which the men who are circulating this propaganda might have ascertained the facts. They might have ascertained them from the newspapers or from the Weather Bureau or by getting information from the T. V. A. which itself operates in a large number of places in the Tennessee Valley where the rainfall is measured. I am going to undertake to show that the rainfall, which it was said was normal in January, was more than 300 percent above normal. In some localities in the Tennessee Valley it was greater than any previous record disclosed. Averaging it all up, the rainfall was not quite so heavy as the average rainfall in the Ohio Valley. That is true. It is also true that in January, when the great flood occurred, the rainfall in western Tennessee was greater than in eastern Tennessee where the Clinch River, a tributary of the Tennessee, and the Tennessee River itself have their sources.

Here is a quotation from the Weather Bureau, speaking of Tennessee as a State and taking the State as a whole:

> Precipitation broke many records this month. The State average of 14.74 inches is the greatest ever recorded in any month. Measurable rain fell on an average of 20 days during the month.

That has reference to the month of January of this year.

> The center of the heaviest rain extended from Humphreys County northward along the Tennessee River to the Kentucky line.

In the statement of precipitation by sections, eastern Tennessee is recorded as having had 11.02 inches of rain; middle Tennessee, 15.97 inches of rain; western Tennessee, 18.47 inches of rain. Stations along the Tennessee River registered as follows: Sneedville, 12.14 inches; Norris, 13.03 inches; Clinton, 13.62 inches; Kingston, 13.54 inches; Knoxville, right at the headwaters of the Tennessee River itself, 11.63 inches; Chattanooga, 11 inches; Jacksonville, 23.51 inches.

Yet this propaganda undertakes to show that the rainfall was normal, and the normal rainfall for January is given as 4.59 inches. There are other averages given for that section running as low as 4.11 inches, but the highest goes only a few hundredths of an inch above 4.5 inches. It is always said by these propagandists, and it has been spread all over the United States, that the rainfall was normal, less than 5 inches, when the records show that it was more than three times normal.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know from personal knowledge of the heavy rainfall in eastern Tennessee and western Tennessee because I went through the entire State and saw the conditions as they existed.

I invite the Senator's attention to another matter especially in reference to Norris Dam. Heretofore during similar floods the city of Chattanooga has suffered very greatly. I think during the last flood, which was one of the greatest we ever experienced, the gage was about 10 feet lower than it had been previously. The people of that city gave entire credit for the prevention of a disastrous flood this year to the Norris Dam, which held back the water. In my own mind I have no doubt whatsoever that, especially the holding of the water in the Norris Dam Reservoir, and to some extent by the Wheeler Dam and Wilson Dam Reservoirs, saved great trouble along the meanderings of the Tennessee River.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no doubt that it saved Tennessee and the people along the Ohio River millions of dollars.

Mr. McKELLAR. And perhaps even further down. I invite the Senator's attention to another matter. As the Senator knows, the Cumberland River rises in Kentucky and in a way parallels the Tennessee River. Those two rivers come within 2 or 3 miles of each other at one place. The rainfall was practically the same in the two basins. Terrific havoc was played by the Cumberland River, and yet no disaster occurred on the Tennessee River, showing that the dams on the Tennessee River must have affected the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his illuminating statement.

Mr. President, let me give some more statistics. Reference has been made to the headwaters of the Tennessee River and the Clinch River. It will be remembered that Norris Dam is built on a tributary of the Tennessee River, to wit, the Clinch River. It has a storage capacity of 3,500,000 acre-feet of water. The flood did not even fill the dam reservoir. It was not full when the flood was over. The Wheeler Dam cannot store so much water; but by devices which the engineers have provided, they can, on short notice, increase the height of the Wheeler Dam, and store quite a large volume of water there.

Let us see how much they stored. In the month of January of this year, when the flood on the Ohio River took place, there was stored by the Norris Dam and the Wheeler Dam 964,000 acre-feet of water. While the engineers can estimate these things quite accurately, yet it is true that they are estimates; and a number of engineers have given estimates on this subject. I have taken the lowest one. Some of the engineers have said over their own signatures that in the month of January there was stored behind the Norris Dam 1,200,000 acre-feet of water.

What did that mean, lower down? What did that mean to the Ohio River, from the mouth of the Tennessee to the mouth of the Ohio, where the great damage in most of the Ohio River floods takes place? It meant that the water held back by the Wheeler Dam and the Norris Dam reduced the discharge of the Tennessee River at its mouth into the Ohio by 32,000 cubic feet per second; and remember, along the Ohio River on down to its mouth, the levees and the dikes were full. An inch or two higher water-level would have destroyed them. The water came within an inch or so of the tops of the dikes. Thirty-two thousand additional cubic feet per second would have caused the water to pour over every one of them. No man can tell just how much property was saved. Probably more than the cost of all the dams that have been constructed in the Tennessee Valley was saved in that one flood of the Ohio River.

The T. V. A. have established places where they record the rainfall along the Tennessee River. I have given some of the figures from official reports, but some of those that are kept by the T. V. A. I have not given. I wish to give the record of every one of them, to show the falsity of the propaganda which has gone over the country that nothing but normal rainfall occurred in the Clinch and the Tennessee River Valleys.

First, at Norris, as I have already said, the rainfall during the month of January was 13.03 inches.

At Norris Dam the rainfall was 11.85 inches, nearly a foot.

At La Follette the rainfall was 9.48 inches, and that was the lowest rainfall anywhere in the watershed.

At White Creek the rainfall was 13.44 inches.

At Norris Island the rainfall was 12.64 inches.

At C. C. C.-T. V. A. Camp No. 22 the rainfall was 11.43 inches.

At C. C. C.-T. V. A. Camp No. 13, the rainfall was 14.50 inches.

At Big Barren it was 12.05 inches.

At Arthur it was 13.92 inches. It lacked just a few hundredths of being 14 inches in that 1 month.

At Tazewell the rainfall in January was 11.99 inches—practically a foot of rainfall.

At Big Sycamore it was 11.88 inches.

At another C. C. C.-T. V. A. Camp No. 5, it was 13.21 inches.

At Sneedville it was 12.14 inches.

At Flat Gap it was 17.68 inches. Think of it, Senators—nearly 18 inches of rainfall, a foot and a half.

At Little War Gap it was 10.46 inches.

Those are all of the gages kept in the Tennessee watershed. I have them also for Virginia and Kentucky to a great extent. I shall not go into the subject further. I think I have shown enough to show that this propaganda is based on an absolute falsehood, one that might have been ascertained to be such without any difficulty and without any expense, by calling someone to the telephone. It is only an illustration of the procedure that is going on, not only in this respect but in every other respect, over the United States, to cause the people to get an idea that the T. V. A. has accomplished nothing.

It is not fair sportsmanship for the unfriendly newspapers and the unfriendly representatives of the private power companies to circulate these false and malicious reports. Why, an ordinary professional poker player would have more sportsmanship than that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator read the gage as reported by the T. V. A. at Coulters Dam and at White Creek. Those are two places, as the Senator knows, where we have been trying to authorize the T. V. A. to build other dams. If they were built, they would add immeasurably to the safety from floods of all those farther down.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator again.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I desire to say that the financial saving brought about by the T. V. A. activities has been demonstrated. It is almost a mathematical demonstration in a great many respects when we consider flood control alone, without considering the many other things in which the T. V. A. is engaged to make a happier and a brighter life for the people of the Tennessee Valley, and to set an example for the rest of the country to follow if they see fit. When the other dams are completed, the effect will be, as a practical proposition, to regulate the Tennessee River so that its volume will be almost the same at all seasons of the year, thus bringing about the maximum amount of navigation, the maximum amount of flood control, the maximum amount of power that can be produced, and it is only an illustration of what would happen in the Cumberland, in the Ohio, in the Mississippi, in the Missouri, and in every great river in the United States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, if we should follow that course.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment.

I am in full agreement with what the able Senator from Nebraska has said about the Tennessee Valley project. But I must say that, in my judgment, the address of the President on the 4th of March, in its interpretation by the people, has given a false impression.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have discussed the President's speech in but one respect. Does not the Senator agree with me that the President's statement on the Tennessee Valley was 100-percent truthful and correct, and that the persons who are trying to have the country believe he stated a falsehood are without any ground to stand on?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have already said that, so far as the Tennessee Valley matter is concerned, as stated by the Senator from Nebraska, I am in full accord with him. But there are other implications from the speech made by the President on the 4th of March. I quote:

> But how can we confidently complete that Tennessee Valley project—

I have not any fault to find with that—> or extend the idea to the Ohio and other valleys while the lowest courts have not hesitated to paralyze the operations by sweeping injunctions?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator object to that statement?

Mr. COPELAND. No; not to this point; but pretty soon I am going to object to something that is in this address.

Mr. NORRIS. Just so the Senator does not object to that, that is all I care about.

Mr. COPELAND. I read further from the President's remarks:

> The Ohio River and the Dust Bowl are not conversant with the habits of the interstate-commerce clause. But we shall never be safe in our lives, in our property, or in the heritage of our soil until we have somehow made the interstate-commerce clause conversant with the habits of the Ohio River and the Dust Bowl.
> In the campaign of 1936 you and I, and all who supported us, did take cognizance of the Ohio River and the Dust Bowl. We said, of course, we will continue our efforts for drought and flood control * * * for these things we have only just begun to fight.
> Here, too, we cannot afford, either individually or as a party, to postpone or run away from that fight on advice of defeatist lawyers. Let them try that advice on sweating men piling sandbags on the levees at Cairo.

Mr. President, I am sure I am justified in stating that the implication of this statement—and I do not impute any unworthy motives or thought to the President—is that somehow or other the courts have interfered with the control of the floods upon the Ohio River and its tributaries.

Reference is made directly to that in the words used by the President:

> Let them try that advice on sweating men piling sandbags on the levees at Cairo.

The sweating men on the levees at Cairo were obliged to sweat and to carry on, and will be for years to come unless reservoirs and dams are built on the headwaters of the Ohio River.

Last year, in the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, after great tribulation we passed an omnibus flood-control bill. It was before us on the last night of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and a speech which would have done credit to Proctor Knott was made by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. The result of that speech was that the bill was recommitted.

A year later, after we had worked in the committee upon the bill, and no committee ever worked harder or more energetically than did the Committee on Commerce, we presented to the Senate a revised and perfected flood-control bill. That bill authorized that the sum of $310,000,000 be appropriated for carrying out the improvements in the matter of flood control; likewise, the sum of $10,000,000 was authorized to be appropriated and expended in equal amounts by the Departments of War and Agriculture for carrying on any examinations or surveys provided for in that measure or other acts of Congress.

The bill was passed by the House, so the Congress authorized the expenditure of $300,000,000 for flood-control work. It specifically authorized that $50,000,000 of that sum should be appropriated, to be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937.

Was the money appropriated? It was not. The Congress adjourned on the 20th of June, and it was not until the 22d of June that the President approved that omnibus flood-control bill. Consequently, the sweating men on the levees at Cairo should bear in mind that the fault was not of the Congress or the fault of the courts, but it was the fault of the administration, in that it did not make it possible for us to have and to expend this money.

We might now be installing projects on the upper reaches of the Ohio in order to give protection to my State, beginning geographically, to the State of Pennsylvania, to the State of West Virginia, to the State of Kentucky, to the State of Ohio, to the State of Indiana, to the State of Illinois, and on down the Mississippi River. It is not the fault of the Congress, it is not the fault of the courts that these flood-control projects are not now in process of completion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the courts could not have anything to do with a flood-control proposition which never had been commenced. We have not gotten far enough with our program to encounter the courts. But I will say to the Senator that to a great extent the courts are to blame for the delay and the expense occasioned in the case of the Tennessee Valley, where we had gone far enough with the various improvements to interfere with private power interests.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is no difference of opinion between the Senator from Nebraska and me regarding the Tennessee Valley. I am not discussing that now. I am speaking of floods on the Ohio River, from its upper reaches in my State on down to the Gulf of Mexico. We authorized appropriations, and it is not the fault of the Congress; it is not the fault of the representatives of the States where flood-control projects are necessary; it is not the fault of the courts; it is not the fault of anybody except the fault of the administration that there was not an appropriation of money to carry out these projects.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator about its not being the fault of the courts or of the Congress; I agree with that fully; but I do not think the Senator is justified in charging the delay to the administration. Does the Senator mean to say that if the money had been appropriated, the projects on the Ohio River and its tributaries and all those other rivers would have been completed by this time?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course not, and I am not splitting hairs with anyone on that subject. But there would have been some comfort to the sweating men on the levees at Cairo if in their minds there had been the knowledge that projects up the river were in process of completion, projects that when completed would make it unnecessary to sweat blood in order to control the floods and to protect the cities on the lower reaches of these rivers.

Further, Mr. President, in the statement of the President he speaks about the Dust Bowl. The same bill authorized an appropriation of $10,000,000 to have a study made as to how, in connection with the control of rivers, there might be relief from the evils in those sections where the Dust Bowl is located. There would have been a study of other parts of the country where there has been attrition and destruction of soil by reason of floods and similar catastrophies.

I do not want to leave any doubt in the minds of the American people. It is not fair to give them the implication that the reason why we are not proceeding with these flood-control projects is that Congress or the courts have interfered in some way.

I feel aggrieved over the decision of the courts. I was terribly disappointed over the minimum-wage-law decision in my own State. But I want to be fair to the courts. Certainly the courts have nothing whatever to do with the failure to proceed actively and energetically in the control of floods along the great rivers of this country.

I will agree with the Senator from Nebraska regarding the project in which he is interested, for which I voted, and in which I believe. I agree with him that some courts have been ungenerous, perhaps. But as to the big projects, involving relief from floods all over the country from the rock-bound coast of Maine to the golden shores of California, in practically every State, I may say that we studied the problem, we discussed it for days in the Senate, as well as for weeks in the Committee on Commerce, our conclusions are written into the law, and the fact that the law is not in operation is not the fault of the Congress or of the courts, it is the fault of the administration itself.

SIT-DOWN STRIKES AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I listened to the remarks of Senators on Wednesday last in their discussion of the effect of what is called the sit-down strike, and I also listened with interest this morning to the decisive and vigorous statement of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER].

I presume it is very generally agreed that what is known as the sit-down strike finds no justification in law. I think it is generally agreed that it is a form of violence which a government of law and order cannot recognize. But it seems to me that we cannot properly appraise that situation by considering alone the physical fact of workmen holding possession of property not their own against the proper owner. The sit-down strike, unlawful and illegal as it is, when considered in this Chamber, must be considered as a part of the economical situation as a whole.

Whatever there may be as to the legal proposition involved, there is an economic situation which must be considered in connection with the other proposition.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] in his remarks on Wednesday used this sentence:

> Have we a government?

That is what I should like to know. Have we a government which enforces law, a government which protects the rights of the citizen? And when I say "the rights of the citizen" I mean not only his rights as they may be represented in property, but I refer also to human rights.

In order properly to appreciate that situation in Michigan and the situation which is developing now throughout the country, spreading from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Lakes to the Gulf, we must consider something aside from the physical fact, that these men are in possession of property not their own. As I look at it they are fighting for what they deem to be their rights in an economic system which is dominated in a large measure at this time by lawlessness and largely by reason of the fact that the Government does not enforce the law upon the statute books.

In order that we may fully understand this interrogation of the able Senator from Illinois as to whether we have a Government which enforces law, let us go back a little in order that we have a full presentation of all the facts and in order that we may avoid what might appear to be a partisan discussion of a nonpartisan subject. I think there is a condition prevailing in this country which is full of injustice to a large body of our people and which is calculated to breed discontent and lawlessness throughout the land. I have reference to the disregard and defiance of our laws relative to monopolies and trusts. They continue from year to year to violate the laws of the land.

Mr. President, in 1928 and 1929 we had, perhaps, the greatest wealth-producing years in the history of the world. We produced more wealth in this country than at any other period for the same length of time in the history of our country. Nothing like it in the story of material advancement in recorded history. Vast fortunes were built and to such an extent that they became the subject of comment and discussion everywhere. But at the time that this vast wealth was being developed, and in the year 1929, over 50 percent of the people of the United States were living on less than the bare necessities of life.

That cannot continue under any form of government, republican, democratic, or despotic. It did not arise out of what might be said are the ordinary disparities and struggles in the economic world. It was a condition which arose in a large measure out of the fact that there were vast economic forces in the United States, vast corporate interests living in violation of the law of the United States and, in violation of the law of the United States, crushing out of existence hundreds of thousands of small-business men. It was in a large measure the fruits of lawlessness.

Mr. President, we cannot successfully appeal for law and order, we cannot successfully appeal for the majesty of law, only to one sector of the economic circle. The economic system of the United States must come back and live under law and in accordance with law as a whole, and in accordance with the authority of the Government. Otherwise we shall plant the seeds of disorder and lawlessness which will spread to the four corners of the country, as it seems to be doing now.

We have developing at this time exactly the condition which existed during 1928 and 1929. We have prosperity in this country in places to an exaggerated degree. Money is being made upon a stupendous scale. We have a return of those conditions, and we talk about a return to the prosperous conditions of 1928 and 1929. If we return to the economic conditions of 1928 and 1929 and undertake to live upon the basis of those conditions we shall in a very short time have a return of the conditions from 1930 to 1936. If you have an economic system which gathers in the dimes and the quarters and the half-dollars from the common people of the United States through artificial prices, and pours them into the coffers of a few great corporations, thereby destroying the purchasing power of the great masses of the people, you cannot maintain a healthy economic or financial condition in this country. I am one of those who take the position that until you destroy—not control or regulate—but until you destroy the monopolistic control of the economic affairs of the United States you are not going to have order and law and lawful action upon the part of those who have to deal with it. Lawlessness fattens by what it feeds upon.

The President in his inaugural address said:

> But here is the challenge to our democracy: In this Nation I see tens of millions of its citizens—a substantial part of its whole population—who at this very moment are denied the greater part of what the very lowest standards of today call the necessities of life.
> I see millions of families trying to live on incomes so meager that the pall of family disaster hangs over them day by day.
> I see millions whose daily lives in city and on farm continue under conditions labelled indecent by a so-called polite society half a century ago.
> I see millions denied education, recreation and the opportunity to better their lot and the lot of their children.
> I see millions lacking the means to buy the products of farm and factory and by their poverty denying work and productiveness to many other millions.
> I see one-third of a nation ill-housed, ill-clad, ill-nourished.

That, Mr. President, is the picture drawn by the Chief Magistrate of this Government in his inaugural address. I think it accurate. I think it true. Indeed, I think it moderate. I think it is a picture which ought to be drawn. But I ask this body, and I ask the people of the United States, how are you going to avoid having one-half of our population living a meager existence and on the ragged edge of hunger and want if you permit an economic system which through the power of fixing prices accumulates untold billions in the hands of some 2,500 or a few thousand men?

Have we a government? Can we protect this 50 percent? We can. We have the power if we will only have the determination. Why, Mr. President, we have now practically the condition that existed in 1929—36,000 families at the top of the economic ladder drawing an income equal to that of 11,500,000 at the foot of the ladder.

You may talk about your courts, you may talk about your Constitution, you may talk about order and law, you may talk about sit-down strikes, but in an economic system thus controlled there is no such thing as economic justice, and where there is no economic justice there can be no safety or security for Constitution or courts or for the citizen.

Let me call attention to another item which appeared in the newspapers a few days ago. Effort has been made to relieve these situations.

> The Home Owners' Loan Corporation has made 1,000,000 mortgage loans.
> It now reveals that 160,000 foreclosure proceedings are completed, pending, or shortly to be started.
>
> That means a 16 percent home mortality rate among the homes H. O. L. C. supposedly "saved."
> That means the sidewalks for 16 out of every 100 home owners to whose rescue H. O. L. C. galloped.

We can pour the contents of the Federal Treasury into this place and into that place in order to relieve suffering humanity and as a temporary expedient do the best we can with that particular situation, but what we are concerned to know is whether it is possible to secure for those people whom we are seeking to help that equitable distribution of the wealth of the United States which will enable them to keep their homes after they have been permitted to possess them. These people who are now homeless once owned homes. They lost them under a monopolistic system. It is useless to give them homes again unless the economic system is to be changed. They cannot hold them.

Although the return of prosperity in places, as I have said, is apparent, and can be easily demonstrated, it is not making any particular inroads into the great number of unemployed; it is not reducing the number of those who are living on a most meager basis, and it will not do so. We will, perhaps, return precisely to where we were in 1929, with half the people of the United States without the means of a decent living.

Mr. Wallace, in his interview, said:

> I think very definitely that the Government does not have sufficient powers effectively to mitigate the wide swings of the business cycle.

"Business cycle" for whom? For one-half the people of the United States there is no "business cycle"; prosperity or depression is about the same to them. They are living on a meager basis of existence even in the days of the height of prosperity and they are living on nothing less, perhaps, in the days of adversity or the days of depression. There is no "business cycle" so far as one-half our people are concerned, they are always at that point in their existence where they can look forward to nothing but a continuation of the conditions from which they are suffering. And it will always be so if we permit private interests to fix prices.

So far as power is concerned, Mr. President, in connection with the subject with which I am dealing today, there is no provision of the Constitution, no decision of the courts, standing in the way of uprooting and destroying all the monopolistic power which is today fixing prices for the American people on all the great necessities of life. We have ample power. There is not a monopoly in the United States but is operating by reason of some grant given it either by the National Government or by State governments.

There is not a monopoly in existence but is in existence by consent or connivance of government; there is not a raid being made upon the small-business man in the United States but is being made by the consent or connivance of government. The power belongs to us; and we will either exercise it, we will either exert that power and restore economic justice to the economic system of the United States or, take my word for it, we will have something more than sit-down strikes in the United States. The people reflected much and thought deeply during the dark days of the depression, and they feel there is something to be righted.

It is not uninstructive, Mr. President, to recall that such economic conditions were those which furnished the battalions for Mussolini in his march on Rome. It was hunger and nakedness and economic chaos which broke the hold of the Czars and invited Lenin to come in and take charge. It was the inordinate greed of monopoly and the demands of the landlords in Germany which broke the nerve of the manhood and womanhood of Germany and opened wide the road for Hitler. No form of government, no form of constitution, however sacred in the minds of the people, no courts, no theory of free government can stand indefinitely against economic injustice which is undermining the manhood and womanhood of a vast portion of the people of our country.

We are now greatly disturbed by the question of the increased cost of living, of the rise of prices, and of inflation. If you will study the question of price rise, you will find that there is nothing but a normal increase in those regions not controlled by monopolies or combines. It is only in those lines and in those economic regions where combines and monopolies exist that prices are shooting up. It is only in instances where articles and commodities are so manipulated that prices are getting apparently out of control, and they are raising the prices for whom? They are raising them for the entire 130,000,000 people. They have the taxing power; they levy tribute; they tax just as specifically as we tax; they put upon the people all the tax they think they will bear, and they put the proceeds into their own coffers.

I believe, Mr. President, I think as strongly as does anyone, that property has its rights and is entitled to protection, but when a vast number of workingmen and working women are struggling in an economic world where lawlessness prevails, we cannot expect them to always abide by the laws of our country. This is more than a labor problem; it is a national economic problem as wide and as broad as the Government itself. It is our task to see that some remedy is provided and that the law will be enforced as to all if we expect it to be enforced as to a part. We must all agree that obedience to law is the very foundation upon which free government rests. But the question is how to secure obedience. My contention is that obedience from some and disobedience from others begets disobedience from all. We are said to be the most lawless civilized nation in the world. Crime is nothing less than alarming. I cannot disassociate this lawlessness from the lawlessness in the business world upon the part of those who believe they are strong enough to defy the law.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR FLOOD-CONTROL PROJECTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a few moments some of the questions raised by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but before doing so I desire to refer to a statement made by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

As I understood the Senator, he charged—and I presume we will see the charge on the front page of many newspapers—that the President of the United States was directly responsible for work not being done to prevent floods on the Ohio. If I am mistaken in my understanding, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. President, I listened carefully to the statement which was made by the Senator from New York. The inference that he drew is, in my judgment, wholly, completely, and unequivocally without justification.

In the first place, I deny that there was any orderly plan provided in the bill to which the Senator referred to prevent floods on the Ohio. A short time before the bill finally passed, and before some changes had been made, it was referred to by the genial and affable Senator from the State of Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] as something like a hodgepodge, if my memory does not serve me wrongly.

In the second place, Mr. President, I understood the charge was based upon the statement that the President received an authorization bill and failed to sign it for a certain number of days. I do not recall whether it was 1 day or 2 days or 10 days or 15 days. Reasoning from the fact that a bill had been sent to the President containing authorizations for various projects scattered around over the country, which he did not sign in the next few minutes after he received it and send it back to the Senate, I gather that the Senator from New York charges that by not sending back here immediately that authorization bill providing for an aggregation of projects the President is thereby responsible for the floods on the Ohio.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will permit me to make one more statement, then I will yield.

Mr. MINTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if I am wrong, I should like to be corrected, but during the 10 years I have been a Member of this body I have understood that when an authorization bill passed the Senate, any Senator could then offer to attach to the proper appropriation bill an amendment designed to carry out the authorization, and that it would be in order so to do. I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I got the impression at the time the bill was before the Senate that there would be no attempt made by anybody to procure an appropriation to carry out the authorizations provided at the last session. So it would be entirely immaterial whether the President kept the bill a day or 2 days or a month.

Mr. BLACK. And, even if it were material, may I call attention to the fact that the Senate was still here; Senators were still on the floor; they were still able to talk, perhaps; they were still able to offer amendments to appropriation bills? It was in order to offer an amendment to the proper appropriation bill providing an appropriation for projects which had been authorized by this body.

The appropriation had been authorized by this body. Who is responsible, if it be true that the failure to pass the appropriation bill brought on the flood? Not the President. The President was not in the Senate. Someone who was in charge of the bill certainly should have asked that the authorization be carried out and the appropriation made if it would mean prevention of floods.

Therefore, Mr. President, I suggest that, in my judgment, it is just a trifle far-fetched—other words might be appropriate—to suggest that the President of the United States is responsible for the failure to start work on the Ohio River because he failed to sign a bill, which action or failure to act in no way stopped the hand of any Senator from offering an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. MINTON. Who was in charge of the flood-control bill? I remember the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] speaking on it, but who had it in charge?

Mr. BLACK. My recollection is it was the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

Mr COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course it would ill become me to attempt to instruct the Senator from Alabama in some of the fundamentals of the Constitution. He is a very distinguished lawyer. The Senator may recall that unless this instrument has been entirely discarded it provides, in section 9, article I, that—

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

Also in order to have it become a law the bill has to be signed by the President.

When the Senator, who is usually clear minded, talks about a hodgepodge, he has in mind or talks about a bill which was a hodgepodge and was defeated a year before the bill which finally became a law was enacted. The latter bill passed both Houses, went to conference, the conference report was agreed to, and was accepted by the Senate on the 2d day of June 1936. It so happens that the bill was not signed by the Vice President, for some reason which I do not know, until the 15th of June. We were in session after that until the 20th of June. The President did not sign the bill until the 22d of June. Will the Senator tell me how in the name of heaven we could get an appropriation when we had no law authorizing it?

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], who was good enough to withdraw from this pernicious bill an amendment which he had previously had inserted in it, says he did not understand that it provided for an orderly procedure of flood control. I commend to the Senator from Indiana, Public Law No. 738. When he reads it he will find that the bill did provide and the law does provide for an orderly correction of defects upon the various rivers which, if corrected, would control floods.

Mr. President, I say again that the reason why no money is being expended now upon the rivers of America to prevent floods is because the President did not sign the bill in time to get it back to us so that an appropriation could be made.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, we have heard of the serious delinquencies which tied and shackled the hands of the Senator from the great Empire State of New York in such manner that it was wholly and completely impossible for him to offer an amendment to an appropriation bill. It may be he was ill at that time.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield again to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. As a matter of fact, I did rise on the floor to ask if, in advance of the final signature by the President, it would be proper to add an appropriation item, and I was assured by the parliamentarians of the Senate that it could not be done until the authorization bill had been signed.

Mr. BLACK. I should think the Senator from New York, with his tenacity of purpose, with his desire to serve the people who live on the headwaters of this stream where it was likely to bring on floods, would not have depended upon the statement of a gentleman who is not a member of this body, but would have risen in his place, addressed the presiding officer and said, "Mr. President, floods are liable to beat down upon the homes of the people of the State of New York and I ask that I permitted to offer an amendment to an appropriation bill."

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I will read now rule XVI of the Senate which was in effect at that time.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I was just going to call the attention of the Senator to rule XVI or so much of it as specifically provides that whenever a bill or resolution of authorization is passed and signed, an amendment to an appropriation bill is in order to provide the funds.

Mr. BLACK. Certainly. Rule XVI, paragraph 1, provides:

> All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

In other words, Mr. President, I know that if the Senator from New York, with his persuasive eloquence, had risen in his place and asked that an amendment be put on an appropriation bill to protect the people of the Ohio Valley from rushing floods which were coming down in the spring, he could have convinced us that rule XVI meant what it said in spite of anything any parliamentarian said to the contrary.

He had a perfect right to rise and offer such an amendment to an appropriation bill. It was in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. President, I say that if there was any Member of this body who knew that it was essential that the bill be passed in order to prevent death and destruction on the Ohio River, and if the Member who knew it was necessary that the appropriation bill be passed and he failed or neglected to exert himself to get such an amendment adopted, upon him and not upon the President of the United States rests the responsibility for the floods on the Ohio River.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. In the first place, let me correct a wrong impression the Senator seems to have. I did not refer to the official parliamentarian of the Senate. I spoke of parliamentarians of the Senate and was referring to Senators.

In the next place, I suppose the rules of the Senate by usurpation might set aside the Constitution. As a matter of fact, every Senator knows that unless there is an authorization by substantive law permitting an appropriation, it cannot be made. The Senator may be facetious and eloquent. He paid me a great tribute about what I could do, but there are some things I cannot do, and one is to take money out of the United States Treasury unless and until there is a law permitting it.

I am willing to take all the blame in the world which properly rests upon me, and, if it is my fault, I gladly carry the responsibility; but it is not the fault of the Senator from New York, it is not the fault of the Senate of the United States nor of the Congress. The fact is we did not get the authorization which should have been given us by law.

There was a rumor about the Senate that it did not make much difference whether or not we made such an appropriation, that relief funds could be used for the purpose. But if the bill had become a law and if the authorization had been made, there is no manner of doubt that the Senate by unanimous vote would have appropriated the necessary money.

The Senator may split hairs or may be facetious or may be playful, but the fact remains that, in my opinion, the work on the Ohio River and its tributaries is not being done, because the President did not give us an opportunity to make the appropriation in order that the work might be done. It is a serious thing. To those men sweating on the river, to those who have lost their property, it is a serious matter, so serious indeed that it would have been a wonderful thing if the administration had recognized the possibility that lightning might strike twice in the same place within 2 years. It was not anticipated that it might, but it did, and the reason why the work is not being done is the reason I have stated—the failure of the administration to make it possible.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, a long time ago I read something which said that "A woman convinced against her will is of the same opinion still." Sometimes I think perhaps that statement might apply to Senators. All Senators here, nine-tenths of the occupants of the galleries who have sat there any length of time, even the "fans" who come to the galleries, are familiar with the fact that when an appropriation has been authorized by this body, every time the appropriation bill is up some Senator rises in his place and, when a question is raised as to violating the rule, says, "This body has already authorized it", and it is held in order, and the Senators vote upon whether or not it shall go into the bill.

I do not care to go any further into that question. Every Senator here knows that that is the rule which is followed all the time, not by unsurpation, but because this body has reserved unto itself some of the privileges which have not been taken away from it by other branches of government.

Mr. President, I desire now to discuss for a few minutes the question mentioned by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and to go just a little farther back than he did in considering some of the underlying causes of the trouble that exists in this country between labor and employers.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BONE. This is a very illuminating argument about how far we may go when an appropriation is authorized. As I look at the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], who is the bete noir of all the Members here in matters of that kind, I remember that in my efforts to increase the amount of funds available for W. P. A., with an authorization for relief in the bill, the Senator from Colorado was kind enough to refrain from making the point of order against my request for an additional amount; but I am wondering if my good friend from Alabama is altogether right in his conclusion that where there is an underlying authorization, an attempt to increase the amount is in order.

This is a very enlightening argument. I am glad to learn this, because it perhaps will permit me to be a little more effective in some directions in the future; but I should like to get clearly in mind the procedure which seems to be under discussion here affecting rule XVI, because I never get two opinions alike on that rule.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the other question which has been referred to, aside from the rule. In the first place, I think it is not necessary to go to the rule for anyone to realize that when there are only 2 or 3 days left at the end of the session, there are not many who would charge the President with such an extreme responsibility as that with which he has been charged on the floor this afternoon.

LABOR CONDITIONS AND JUDICIAL DECISIONS

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in his closing remarks, as I recall, suggested that it was necessary that something be done. He suggested one method which he believed, if it could be accomplished, would tend to alleviate some of the injustices he mentioned. With the Senator's viewpoint on that subject I am in thorough accord, not perhaps as to the possibility or probability of the application of the remedy, but certainly as to the theoretical possibility of curing the disease by that method.

I am, however, of the opinion that the powers of government have been unnecessarily restricted to such an extent that it is no longer possible for the Government itself to enforce the law to which the Senator from Idaho referred in the manner in which it was written. History shows us that when the antitrust law was written, it was intended to prevent all combinations in restraint of trade. History shows us that the great interests of this country, to which the Senator from Idaho referred, diligently sought to obtain from the Congress an amendment which would restrict the enforceemnt of that law except on condition that the agreement was in unreasonable restraint of trade. History shows that a committee of the Congress making a report on that proposal said that it would not be wise or proper to attach such an amendment to the law. History shows that the chambers of commerce and the manufacturers' associations had been exceedingly busy in the effort to obtain the adoption of that amendment. Congress declined so to amend the law. A majority of the Supreme Court overruled the Congress, and did so amend the law. A majority of the Supreme Court overruled their previous decision and wrote into the law that which Congress would not write into the law—a legislative amendment which prevented the enforcement of that law unless the judges themselves should reach the conclusion that the combination was unreasonable.

That, in my judgment, was a judicial amendment to legislation which no power in this country had a right to enact or amend except the people through their representatives in the legislative branch of the Government. I do not believe the Constitution ever gave to the judiciary, in any word or in any clause of that document, expressly or impliedly, the right to amend the antitrust law by adding those terms; and I further believe that since the very day that act was amended by the Court, insofar as any practical enforcement is concerned, it made the act a complete nullity.

A few days ago I had occasion to confer with the Federal Trade Commission about the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law in other respects. I was somewhat familiar with the situation; but I learned that the Federal Trade Commission find themselves impeded in their efforts to enforce the Sherman antitrust law by the decisions which have been made to the effect that if one concern simply buys the assets of another that does not constitute restraint of trade. We are all familiar with the fact of the intricate maze of intercorporate devices that have been developed in this Nation by the sanction of the courts which, in my judgment, have made it wholly and completely impossible for Congress to write a law which will suppress monopoly as the Senator from Idaho and I both believe it should be suppressed. The Senator will recall that I was one of those in this body who agreed with him when the original N. R. A. bill came before this body.

Mr. President, let us now look a little farther back. As the Senator says, it is always necessary to look at causes in order to understand the phenomena of the times.

People once thought the States of the Union would have the right to enact legislation, as Mr. Justice Holmes, on one occasion, said, somewhat as an experimental laboratory on economic conflicts. That was the desire of those who wrote the document which laid down the fundamental principles of division of powers and the mechanics of government. Mr. Jefferson very early said that as the courts were proceeding, it would be only a short time until they would absorb the powers of the States. He was a greater prophet than even his most intimate friends could have dreamed at that time.

Let us see, now, what has happened with reference to the very circumstance which has been mentioned on the floor of the Senate today.

As chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate, I have not been unaware of the fact that a serious situation exists in the Nation today. He would be blind who could not have foreseen it. Lawlessness of an individual can be controlled. What is called lawlessness of large collective groups frequently has behind it, just as the Senator intimated in his speech, some injustices which must be suppressed. One of the great writers of the world said on one occasion that there is only one thing that is stronger than the force of armies—the force of an idea. There come times, as we all know, when force ceases to accomplish the object sought. Anyone who could contemplate the dissension and strife which exists in America today without the feelings of apprehension manifested by the distinguished Senator from Idaho would certainly be lacking in ability to appreciate, or would be callous as to results.

Mr. President, let us see how the matter can be handled, and what we or anyone else can do. There is the issue.

I was brought up in the atmosphere where the sentiment prevailed that to the State should be left every particle of power to control peculiarly local affairs which could be left to them with safety to the Nation. I still adhere to that doctrine.

Some years ago there was considerable trouble in the great State of Kansas. The legislature met and passed a law. Whether it was a good law or a bad law I do not undertake to say, but I do say that Alexander Hamilton in his palmiest days of seeking concentration of power in the Federal Government would never have dreamed that the people of a State would have the right to enact such a law. They had already attempted to pass a law providing for compulsory arbitration, which as I recall, was opposed both by labor and employers. I may not be correct in that, but it is my recollection that such a law was enacted, and was stricken down by the court.

The question then arose as to how the people of the State of Kansas should seek to solve their labor problems. Most of us believe that peculiarly local problems should be solved by the local communities. The people of Kansas knew their problem. They looked around and found that the first law they had drawn had been stricken down by the court by a majority vote. Then they learned that one of the questions at issue was whether or not a man would have a right to belong to a labor union. Many of the people of the State of Kansas, like many people in the Nation today, had believed that when the Bill of Rights was added to the Constitution, it meant that a man had a right to join a labor union or not, as he saw fit.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Have not the members of labor unions always been opposed to compulsory arbitration?

Mr. BLACK. I stated a while ago that I understood they opposed it in the State of Kansas.

Mr. WALSH. So that the law enacted in the State of Kansas to which the Senator has referred was passed over the wishes and desires of the workers?

Mr. BLACK. That was one law, but whether it was passed over the wishes and desires of one particular group, in my judgment, has nothing to do with the issue as to whether the people themselves should run their own Government.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. If a law provided for compulsory arbitration, would it not violate the Bill of Rights, to which the Senator is now referring?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think so; but that is wholly immaterial to the point I am discussing. What I am saying is that here was an effort of a State through its people to exercise its sovereign power to attempt to bring about a settlement.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator think there is even the remotest possibility of any State in the Union now regulating its own economic life in the light of interpretations of the fourteenth amendment by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BLACK. That is exactly what I have started out to discuss.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to ask the Senator about the statute of Kansas providing for compulsory arbitration. Was it declared unconstitutional by the State courts or the Federal courts?

Mr. BLACK. By the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator believe that a statute which required the forceable arbitration of a labor dispute and the compulsory or enforced labor of men in accordance with the agreement reached raises a Federal question, and violates the rights guaranteed to the workers in the Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution?

Mr. BLACK. I am not at this time passing on the merits or demerits of the decision. I am proceeding with a line of cases to show that the States have been deprived of their power to regulate, and that the United States Government has, as well.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will yield just a moment further, the reason for my inquiry is that this question was raised a day or two ago before the Judiciary Committee, which is now considering the Supreme Court proposal of the President, and Mr. Green, of the American Federation of Labor, was present and uttered the same views the Senator from Texas now is trying to express, that the statute to which the Senator from Alabama has referred did infringe upon the rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and that labor was therefore opposed to it, and aided in securing the final court decision overthrowing that State statute.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, after this law was stricken down, as I had begun to say, the State of Kansas looked around to see what it could do with reference to bringing about action in that State which would enable it to prevent industrial warfare. They reached the conclusion that one of the great factors contributing to industrial strife was the fact that employers in that State made those who worked for them sign contracts promising that they would not join a union, with the understanding that if they did join a union they would lose their jobs. That is what is usually referred to as the "yellow dog" contract.

The Legislature of the State of Kansas enacted legislation on that subject. The legislation wound its weary way to Washington, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there by a divided Court the law was held unconstitutional.

A short time before and a short time afterward it was known that injunctions had been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States restricting the right of the worker and placing him under the domination of the orders of the Federal courts. Kansas therefore found that, whichever way she turned in an effort to adjust labor disputes, they came to Washington.

In 1898 the State of Utah had trouble in the labor field. Influences were exerted, and finally a law was passed providing for an 8-hour day in mines. That wound its way to the Supreme Court of the United States and there was at that time a majority of that Court which believed that it would be all right to pass such a law. Therefore the majority at that time sustained Utah's 8-hour law for miners.

In 1904 the great Empire State of New York reached the conclusion that the time had come to attempt legislation which would aid in preventing industrial strife and warfare.

A law was enacted which prohibited bakers from being employed more than 10 hours in any one day. The case involving that law wound its weary way to the Supreme Court in Washington, and a majority of the then Supreme Court judicially ascertained that there was no possible connection between the health of the workers and a 10-hour day in a bakery, in the State of New York, even though 6 years before a majority had held that there was a close connection between the health of the worker and an 8-hour day in the mines of Utah.

In 1916 another western State, the great State of Oregon, concluded that it should have a 10-hour law. Such a law was enacted in that State. Finally a case involving that law wended its weary way to Washington. A majority of the Supreme Court held that a connection was shown between working 10 hours in Oregon and the health of the worker, although they had held in 1904 that there was no connection in the State of New York between the health of the worker and a 10-hour day. So today there is a 10-hour law in Oregon, sustained by the majority of those who sat on the Supreme Court in 1904. There is no 10-hour law for bakers in New York, because a majority of the justices who were on the bench in 1916 held that there was no connection between health and a 10-hour day in the State of New York.

These States were endeavoring by legislation to bring about a correction of certain abuses which they contended had been established in their States. The legislation was enacted with a view to bringing about social welfare and preventing strife and conflict between workers and employers. But if a man happens to live in the State of New York, there is no protection for him against a 10-hour day, even though the people believe he should have it. Why? Because a majority of the judges who sat on the Supreme Court in 1904, at that time, in deciding what the Constitution provided, decided that it was contrary to the written Constitution for the people of New York to protect their workers from a 10-hour day.

The same written Constitution was in existence in 1898 that was in existence in 1904 and that was in existence in 1916. The Constitution did not change. The judges changed from time to time.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McADOO in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator will recall that in the New York case, the Lochner case, the Court referred to the Holden case upholding the law prescribing an 8-hour day for miners in Utah; and in the prevailing opinion in the Lochner case the Justice who wrote the opinion sarcastically referred to this type of legislation as a "meddlesome interference", and then further along in the opinion also sarcastically referred to the improper motives that impelled a legislature to try to protect the workers. The whole opinion was filled with sarcastic references to the motives of the legislature that passed that sort of legislation.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. It was held to be a meddlesome interference in the State of New York, but a helpful regulation in the States of Oregon and Utah. It may be true that there is something about the climate or the atmosphere of Oregon that is injurious to the health of its workmen which is not true in the State of New York. However, I have always been led to believe, although I have not had the pleasure of visiting the State of Oregon, that it has a very salubrious and healthful climate, and, to say the least, that it is on a par with the State of New York when it comes to the number of hours that a man can work without injury to his health. But it has been judicially determined that there is a difference. Woe be unto the man who questions the invalidity of the ruling that it is less healthy to work in the State of Oregon than it is to work in the State of New York.

Mr. ROBINSON. He is not a "good sportsman." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. No; he is lacking in sportsmanship. He is not willing to trust the umpire.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wonder if the Senator has given any thought to whether or not the limitation on the number of hours of work should be made to apply to agriculture as well as to urban industries.

Mr. BLACK. I have given considerable thought to that subject, and I shall be very happy indeed to discuss it when we reach a question of legislation dealing with it. At this time I am discussing the background of the situation as it has been pictured today. From that I do not intend to depart.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator knows, as we all know, that not only the average farmer but the average farm worker, from planting time to harvest time, from spring until fall, often puts in a 12-hour day in getting his crop in the ground, in keeping it cultivated, and in reaping it. In the last Congress we heard a great deal about parity between agriculture and industry. I should like to know if we are to have one kind of standard for industry and another kind of standard for agriculture.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, as I stated in the beginning, I do not intend to be diverted at this time from a discussion of the opinions of the Court. I contend that when it comes to a question of how a policy shall be established, the Constitution of this Nation says that it shall be established by the lawmaking body and not by the judges.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. The remarks of the Senator from Maryland prompted the thought that there has been a discrimination on the part of our Government between the farmer and the manufacturer in this respect, that we can help the manufacturer by giving him the benefit of indirect taxes but we cannot do it for the farmer.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not want a remark to stand in the RECORD——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not mean to interrupt the Senator further, but——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I must object to being interrupted in what I am discussing. I do not wish to be diverted from what I am discussing.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want a remark to stand in the RECORD which might cause misunderstanding. Following the passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act we passed the Soil Conservation Act. For the purpose of argument I will not say that the latter act is either good or bad; but under that act the result is that every farmer in Maryland is entitled to cash benefits, including the Senator from Maryland, who owns a farm in Maryland, and the same thing applies to Indiana. So what can be done for the capitalist has been and is being done for the farmer in every State in the Union.

Mr. BLACK. Yes, Mr. President; after 150 years the farmer finally did get a little recognition.

Mr. MINTON. But the Supreme Court has not passed on the Soil Conservation Act.

Mr. BLACK. I am not going to discuss that issue. I am discussing the background of the questions that are under discussion today.

Let us take another State. Another State reached the conclusion that one of the causes for strife between the employer and the employee was private employment agencies operating for profit in the State, and after a careful investigation the State decided that it would make it unlawful for anyone to conduct a private employment agency for money. Of course the State did not recognize that it had a superior in the matter of determining what was for the best interests of the people in settling strikes between employer and employee. The law was passed. It wound its weary way to Washington, and when it reached the Supreme Court of the United States a majority of the Supreme Court said, "Why, you cannot do that. A majority of us do not like that law. We do not think it is reasonable, and since we do not think it is reasonable it has to be unconstitutional."

I deny that the framers of the Constitution of the United States ever contemplated that jurists should be given power to determine what was reasonable for the people of the State of Wyoming or the other States of the Union in connection with local legislation which did not come in direct conflict with some express, unequivocal provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I know the Senator is aware of the fact that a third of a century ago the Supreme Court of the United States removed all these issues from the realm of controversy by assuming general supervision of the legislation that we in the State of Washington should elect to pass or that should be passed by the legislature of any other State. In the Lochner case, a memorandum of which I happen to have in my desk, and which I have read many times, four members of the Court indicated, in the opinion written by Mr. Justice Harlan, that the Supreme Court would transcend its functions if it assumed to annul the statute of New York, and would bring all such very practical legislative matters under the supervision of the Supreme Court.

Of course, I had always had an idea—rather vague, I will have to admit, in the light of these decisions—that the Court was merely to interpret the law and not to assume supervision of economic and political issues; but Justice Harlan in this instance said that the Court assumed jurisdiction of this kind of legislation and that—

> A decision that the New York statute is void under the fourteenth amendment will, in my opinion, involve consequences of a far-reaching and mischievous character.

Of course, I do not know that what we face today is mischievous, but it certainly is sufficient to give us pause and food for sober reflection. Justice Harlan said that—

> Such a decision would seriously cripple the inherent power of the States to care for the lives, health, and well-being of their citizens.

Then Justice Holmes comes along and adds this further illuminating thought:

> This case is decided upon an economic theory which a large part of the country does not entertain.

He says further:

I think that the word "liberty" in the fourteenth amendment is perverted when it is held to prevent the natural outcome of a dominant opinion.

I make this suggestion because the Supreme Court has ended all these doubtful matters by deciding that the States have not any right to adopt the kind of legislation which the Senator has discussed.

Mr. BLACK. I thank the Senator from Washington.

Sometime after the State had decided to try to bring about adjustments in industrial strife by absolutely prohibiting private employment agencies, and the Court had said that, in its opinion, the State could regulate but could not prohibit the State of New Jersey, which up to that time had been possessed of some kind of a vague idea that it was a sovereign State, attempted to regulate employment agencies for private gain. That case went to the courts; it, too, wended its way to Washington, and it met with the reception of a divided Court, some of the judges holding that the State could take the action and some that the State of New Jersey could not. Of course, however, there were a sufficient number to say that it could not, because that philosophy has been dominant in the Court for more than 50 years.

The State of Nebraska actually had the temerity to believe that one of the things it had a right to do, in aid of its citizens, was to regulate the size of a loaf of bread, in order that purchasers might be protected from dishonest bakers, and, as Mr. Justice Brandeis said, honest bakers might be protected from dishonest bakers. But a short time after that statute was passed it wended its way to Washington, and when it got to the Supreme Court here it was met by a majority who said, "The State of Nebraska has nothing to do with fixing the size of a loaf of bread; we do not think the State is reasonable in attempting to do any such thing. If the bakers are smart enough to deceive the people as to the size of a loaf of bread, the Constitution of the United States says they cannot be deprived of that liberty." So that law also fell by the wayside.

We all remember that we have had some trouble with minimum-wage laws. One of the frequent causes of labor controversy has been wages. Behind the fight today is the question of wages and working conditions. The people thought that they at least had as much right as those who lived in the original American Colonies had, and the people who lived in the Colonies, under a Government which they fought to obtain their freedom on the ground that it was tyrannical had the right to fix a minimum wage. But about one-hundred-and-some-odd years after the battles for liberty had been fought, when the effort was made to prevent industrial strife and industrial warfare by providing a minimum wage, a majority of the Supreme Court, over the vigorous protests of other Justices on that bench, held that a State had no right to fix a minimum wage. They rendered the famous judicial conclusive determination that there could be no connection between health and a minimum wage and no connection between the morals of women and the amount of money they could get by working in a sweatshop.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not familiar with the details of the case to which the Senator is referring; but, purely for information, may I ask if the minimum-wage act to which he refers applied to those engaged in agriculture as well as to those engaged in industrial pursuits?

Mr. BLACK. I do not recall; I have never read the statute, because, in my study of the case, I was more interested in the question involved as to whether or not the people had the power. I do not know as to the specific question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know, either.

Mr. BLACK. But I do not think it did; I would not make a direct and positive statement, but I am reasonably sure it did not.

Mr. TYDINGS. My recollection is that the statute did not apply to protect those who were engaged in agricultural activities.

Mr. BLACK. That had nothing to do with the Court's decision.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should think it would have.

Mr. BLACK. The Court did not say so. Of course, it may have been a hidden motive. They frequently find hidden motives of Members of Congress in connection with legislation; and it may be if we could get one of the new instruments of some kind by which it is possible to look through things we should find that, down in their minds, they were influenced by the suggestion that perhaps the statute did not properly protect the farmers and therefore it should not protect people who worked in sweatshops. I do not know about that.

In case after case, in State after State, the people have sought to provide remedies against industrial unrest and to provide correction for the abuses which brought on strikes, disorder, and anarchy.

At every step in that hard struggle they have been met by a majority opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, saying, "No; this Constitution, written to protect human liberty and to preserve civil government, stands in the way of your effort to preserve peace industrially and civilly in the State in which you live."

I could cite numerous other instances of the same character with reference to the powers of the State. After the Supreme Court of the United States had held that the State of Kansas had no right to protect the constitutional liberty of a citizen to belong to a union, if he wanted to belong to a union, the Federal Congress passed a law. I assume, with some kind of instrument, the Court looked down into the motives of Congress and found that the statute was intended to be a meddlesome interference with somebody who wanted to discharge every man who worked in his factory if he dared to exercise the right of an American citizen to belong to a union. So the Court said, "No; the State has no power to do it and the Federal Government has no power to do it."

With reference to protecting the minimum wage, they said, "No; that is beyond the power of the people"—that is, the majority of them said so; the minority said in each instance that the majority of the Court were usurping legislative powers and powers that were never granted to them by the Constitution. When it was attempted by the States to bring about a remedy for existing causes of dissension between employer and employee, the Court said, "The State cannot do it, for the Federal Constitution stands in the way." When the Federal Government attempted to correct the abuses which have been found to create strife, disorder, and bloodshed—and bloodshed has been mentioned here today—the Court said, "No; the States cannot do it and the Federal Government cannot do it."

What is the result? We stand today, so far as I can see, after a careful study of the decisions, after reading the opinions of the Justices who are now on the bench, with an insuperable, impossible obstacle to the passage of laws, either by the States or by the Federal Government, which will correct the abuses that have brought on the strike in Michigan or which will give to the States or to the Federal Government the power to restore peace in the great industrial sections of the Nation.

I realize there are some who say, "Well, you have not drawn your laws properly", or "you have not crossed each 't' properly", or "you have not made it sufficiently clear that the action is being taken under a certain provision"; but there is one thing that has happened with monotonous regularity, namely, that whichever method of approach is used it is wrong, insofar as leaving to the people of the States and the Federal Government the right to try to correct the manifest evils and abuses that have brought on civil strife in Michigan and threaten to bring it on in various other sections of the country.

Under the law as it exists today, no one claims that it is legal or within the law of the State of Michigan for a man to sit down and wait and call it a "sit-down" strike. We all know that property rights in one generation may not be property rights in the next generation; all history shows that to be true. There are many people in this Nation; and when we begin to attempt to condemn and criticize and abuse, we had just as well face the fact that there is a deep-seated, widespread conviction among the toilers who have been sitting down in the factories of the country to the effect that laws that are written for their benefit are held contrary to the Constitution of the United States. They cannot get their minimum wage; they cannot, under the law, get protection from what they consider and call the iniquitous "yellow dog" contract.

They know, as every other citizen knows, that all the way down the line it has been due to a bare majority which, as shown in the two conflicting lines of decisions, has represented two conflicting lines of political and economic thought.

I do not question the honesty or integrity of those who decide either way. I think they are absolutely honest in their views. But I say that when we begin to discuss the situation which exists and when we begin to investigate, as I have been trying to investigate recently, what if anything is the power of the Federal Government not merely to try to protect the property rights of somebody, to keep somebody else from sitting down—because that is only one part of the great controversy which is raging—when we begin to try to find how it will be possible for the Federal Government to enact legislation which will tend to bring about, under the law, good order, good government, a method of approach which would restore peace to the Nation, the only thing that has yet been suggested that can legally be done is to use the bayonet and the gun.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Did we not recently enact a law known as the Wagner Act looking to the objective the Senator has been discussing?

Mr. BLACK. We did.

Mr. MINTON. Is it not now awaiting decision by the Supreme Court? Apparently there is a sit-down strike over there, because we cannot get a decision in that case. [Laughter.]

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator feel that a lawyer who has given up practically his entire professional life to the service of a gigantic corporation, and who is subsequently appointed to a place on the bench, lays aside his economic viewpoints, his economic predilections, as the Senator would lay off a coat, and that that is an accomplished fact under our judicial system?

Mr. BLACK. It is my belief that when a man goes on the bench he is still a man; he has the same body and the same mind; he has the same tendencies of thought; and he is still moving in the same direction as to honest beliefs. Understand, I always say "honest", because I believe them always to be that way. There has always been an honest difference of opinion as to political methods of obtaining objectives.

Mr. BONE. But those beliefs, whether or not they be what a man honestly thinks—"as he thinketh in his heart, so is he"—ultimately find themselves shaping the judge's viewpoint. I have mentioned this because of statements of members of the Supreme Court themselves when they talk about certain decisions reflecting the economic predilections of judges who wrote opinions. Certainly no higher authority can be found in the country than such an expression from lips of the members of the Supreme Court themselves, who very casually and very easily were talking about certain decisions reflecting the economic predilections of judges. What can that mean but the economic viewpoint of a judge which was framed and shaped and came into being before he went on the bench? I certainly believe no man goes on the bench and lays off his economic viewpoint as he would lay off a coat.

I do not know why we walk away from what everybody in the world knows to be a fact, but it seems that we do when we indulge in so much argument. I have known a vacancy to occur on a supreme bench, without mentioning which one, and a lawyer to be suggested to fill that vacancy. Immediately all the power companies and railroad companies and other big business interests in the State would say, "We are against that man" or "We are for that man."

With that curiosity which is so much a part of my nature, I would inquire why these particular gentlemen were for this lawyer or against him. The answer would come tripping from the lips of lawyers for power companies or the lumber group in my own State, and from other sources of a similar kind. "We want this lawyer on the supreme bench because he thinks thus and so about economic questions." Why on earth people cannot understand that simple elemental fact, that certain men want certain other men on the bench because they think in a certain way about our economic life and the mechanics of our civilization, is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it had not been my intention in any way to engage at this time in a discussion of the so-called court plan. I did want to present to the Senate some of what I consider to be the underlying causes of the industrial strife which exists in America today. In that connection I wish to read a very short extract from a statement by Justice Harlan many years ago in an opinion, where he said:

> When the American people come to the conclusion that the judiciary of this land is usurping to itself the functions of the legislative department of this Government and by judicial construction is declaring what is the public policy of the United States, we will find trouble. Ninety millions of people—

There were only 90,000,000 people in the United States then.

> Ninety millions of people—all sorts of people, with all sorts of beliefs—are not going to submit to usurpation by the judiciary of the functions of other departments of the Government and the power on its part to declare what is the public policy of the United States.

Mr. President, as I see the situation today, the States have been absolutely stripped of power to take the necessary steps to enact the essential legislation to bring about industrial peace, not by the Constitution written by our fathers, but by a majority of the judges who temporarily occupied places as Justices of the Supreme Court.

It is my further belief the Congress of the United States has had its power whittled down to such a fine point by the majority of the Justices of the United States Supreme Court that it will be almost as impossible as it is for a camel to crawl through the eye of a needle for this body to enact legislation which will tend to alleviate the conditions and correct the abuses which are today responsible for industrial strife in America. I say that with a full apprehension of the belief of the Senator from Idaho and with full concurrence in the statement that it is serious for a nation to find itself in a situation where, when it has a divided sovereignty, neither sovereignty has the power to prevent industrial warfare except by the use of the gun. That never has been successful as a permanent solution of any question in any country in the world where large groups disagreed upon the question. I wish I could believe that a mere enforcement of the antitrust law as it has been emasculated and whittled down and cut away and pared off by decision after decision of the Supreme Court of the United States would accomplish that purpose; but I cannot view it with such optimism.

So, Mr. President, together with some other members of the Committee on Education and Labor, I plan to see if it is possible, as I hope it is, for any proceeding to be taken by Congress which will tend in any way to meet the situation of industrial strife. I have no criticism of the Governor of the State of Michigan or the other authorities of that State; but I do say it is wholly unjust for anyone of take the position that the blame for industrial strife rests on the Congress. A great human movement to bring about justice, such as the Senator from Idaho pictured, cannot be stopped, any more than one man can take a small hand spade and stem the roaring waters of the Mississippi.

SIT-DOWN STRIKERS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], and myself know too well that anything which is said respecting sit-down strikes falls with fateful emphasis and implication at this particular moment in the State of Michigan. In Michigan we confront a condition and not a theory; and the prudent answer to it during the next 24 hours may determine matters literally of life and death.

It is no moment for criticism of anybody or anything, abuse of anybody or anything. So far as the labor front where the issue now stands naked is concerned, it is, above all else, a moment for the coolest counsel. Such troubles cannot be successfully settled with guns and bayonets.

Mr. President, I have scrupulously refrained heretofore from entering the discussion, lest the injection of my legislative view into a situation which is essentially administrative in its primary responsibilities should fruitlessly complicate whatever undertakings the President or the Governor of Michigan may pursue in behalf of composition looking toward industrial peace and industrial justice. Neither have I wanted by any stretch of anyone's imagination, to inject a partisan, political factor into a Michigan situation already frightfully complicated and entirely transcending politics. But with events rushing toward what might too easily be a tragic climax, and with the problem already brought to the Senate floor by others, I cannot permit my silence to be misconstrued by any who might misinterpret it.

First, I desire to agree with the Senator from Idaho to this extent: That it is blindly unrealistic not to recognize the modern need for more enlightened labor relationships in many quarters. I shall support every practical effort to remedy whatever injustice exists in these relationships. For example, I abhor some of the prevailing antilabor technique disclosed by the La Follette committee just as I abhor some of the communistic characteristics which are creeping into some labor technique. I believe in the right of collective bargaining in which every employee is absolutely free to choose his own bargaining representative without intimidation or coercion from any source. I believe that responsible labor unions have rendered, and can render, useful and equitable service to themselves and to the country; and that they will promote their own stabilized influence and authority by accepting legal responsibility therefor. I believe that labor is entitled to a progressively increasing share in the fruits of its own work. I think that appropriate and definite profit sharing is the essential key to the appropriate American labor relationship. I repeat that I shall support every legitimate effort to these ends.

But, Mr. President, I shall equally support every effort to maintain law and order in this land; and anything less is a disservice to labor itself. Without it, nothing else matters. It is primary and paramount. Capital is not entitled to be above the law. No more is labor entitled to be above the law. In the long run, labor will suffer more than any other American group from any desertion of the law and its defense of civil liberties. Illegal trespass cannot be condoned at any time or in any place, no matter who the trespasser may be. America could disintegrate in another swift and reckless 60 days if today's illegal contagion is not stopped.

It has been said in the Senate that this way lies dictatorship. So it does. So it has in other lands. The vast law-abiding mass of citizens, most of them sympathetic to labor progress, will not indefinitely tolerate such a prospectus. But such an issue must not be joined, unless sanity has departed from the land.

It does no good to talk of Wagner laws or any other laws unless there is respect for all law as an indispensable American institution. It does no good to talk of labor courts or the Supreme Court or any other court unless there is respect for all courts as an indispensable American institution. It does no good to talk of labor betterments if they are obtained through the destruction of an orderly society in which to enjoy them. No man can be sure that he may not be tomorrow the victim of a spirit of injustice from which he appears to be a gainer today.

I quote from the editorial column of the New York Times this morning:

> Governor Murphy did not overstate the case when he warned the people of his State that confidence in democratic government can easily be impaired by repeated, unresisted violations of the law, and when he said that "personal liberty will be of little value if the authority and integrity of our courts are not preserved and property rights are not protected."

I commend the Governor's statement, and I concur in it. This is a democracy of law, or it is not a democracy. It is a democracy of law, or it will not long remain a democracy. The sovereignty of law must be maintained, or there is no hope for the social and economic justice which, otherwise, is destined to continue at a rate of great progress in our land.

If employers violate the law, let prompt recourse to the courts correct the offense. If employees violate the law as certified by the courts—and this is my prayerful message to them—let them, for the sake of their own hopes for a free society in which to enjoy the advantages they seek, voluntarily proceed within the law.

Let public officers, oath-bound to support the law, yield nothing finally to the paramount necessity that law and order shall prevail. Let law and order prevail. Then, in an orderly and chastened society, let the grievances of labor be sympathetically assessed, and generously and equitably corrected.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not wish the fact that I speak immediately after my colleague, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], to be taken as an indication that we are engaging in a debate over the situation in Michigan. With much he says I am in complete agreement. I agree with what the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said as to the fundamentals of this difficult situation. But I desire to discuss for a few moments the immediate situation which today faces my friend, Gov. Frank Murphy, of Michigan.

With the general statements of Senators that sit-down strikes are entirely illegal I agree. If those in charge of the situation in Michigan in behalf of the union should ask my advice in the present situation I would unhesitatingly advise them to vacate the Chrysler plants. But that is not the situation which confronts Governor Murphy.

In the General Motors strike at Flint a large number of the employees seized and occupied the body plant for a matter of 5 or 6 weeks. The most conservative newspaper in the State of Michigan, the Detroit Free Press—and I do not mention this in a partisan spirit, but it is a newspaper which strongly opposed Governor Murphy in both the primary and the general election—had this to say after the settlement of the General Motors strike:

THE STRIKE ENDS

> The agreement under which the U. A. W. sit-down strikes in General Motors Corporation plants at Flint and elsewhere are called off, comes in a welcome form at a moment when hope of an early conclusion of the prolonged negotiations in progress before Gov. Frank Murphy seemed at an ebb.
> The adjustment has been reached under conditions suggestive of mutual forbearance, and amid concessions to reason and fairness.
> It puts an end to a highly destructive situation which ought never to have arisen, which has hurt many people and which has brought no benefits that could not have been secured in a much less costly way.
>
> Collective bargaining between men and company can now commence in an orderly way through accredited representatives of both sides; and meanwhile the wheels of industry will turn, and men will be earning wages for the support of their families; considerably increased wages, too, since General Motors, coincidentally with announcement of the agreement, also announces a considerable revision upward of its pay scale.
> The public, which has been one of the chief sufferers during the last 43 days, will fervently echo the hope of Governor Murphy that the adjustment reached may prove to be a contribution to the promotion of peaceful and reasonable labor conciliation in a... America to the exclusion of violent, peremptory methods.
> That the long drawn-out blockade of industry in a vital field finally has reached a happy conclusion under conditions justifying such a hope, unquestionably is due in large degree to the part the Governor has played in the emergency.
> Mr. Murphy made it clear at the start that he would tolerate neither violence nor disorder. Before all else, good order would be maintained and society given protection, he declared. The support of National Guardsmen called out to make this stand effective, was costly; but the results have justified the expense.

There is no black tragedy to mourn over today; no bitter aftermath that will rankle.

At the same time the Governor showed neither bias nor passion. He manifested a good understanding of the situation; and maintained a helpful attitude of impartiality between the parties to the controversy which earned for him the confidence of both sides and made the good offices he tendered effective.

Governor Murphy labored hard and patiently, refusing to give up even when the prospect for success in bringing about a peaceful agreement appeared very small and he won out. What he has done deserves recognition throughout Michigan and in the country generally.

Mr. President, I call your particular attention to the words, "There is no black tragedy to mourn over today; no bitter aftermath that will rankle."

Mr. President, it is easy for the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and it is easy for me to stand here and say, "Drive these unlawful trespassers out of the Chrysler plants." It is easy for Judge Campbell to issue the mandatory injunction ordering them out of the plants. But no one of us, no Senator here, no judge on the bench would pull the trigger of the gun that would shoot down the men in the Chrysler plant tomorrow. The responsibility for the order to fire if necessary is upon the Governor of Michigan.

It was not very long ago when there were some riots here in Washington, and almost everything has been forgotten in connection with the bonus riots except that human blood was shed, that shots were fired at those who were here petitioning the Congress.

Since when, Senators, did we punish trespassers upon real property by a death sentence, without a trial? Yet that is the ultimate of the argument that the Governor should go into the Chrysler plants with either the forces of the sheriff of Wayne County or the National Guard of Michigan, and, if necessary—and nobody brings the problem down to the raw ultimate—shoot down men in order to drive others out of the Chrysler plants?

Mr. President, we do not beat a wayward child into insensibility if he does not agree with and follow the dictates of his parents. We forbear. So I plead in this body, and I plead with the American people, for a little more patience.

In the General Motors strike, after it had lasted some 43 days, during all of which time the plant was occupied by the sit-down strikers, we were patient, and Governor Murphy, with the plaudits of the Detroit Free Press, as indicated with the applause of every major newspaper in our State, and with the approval of most of the newspapers of the country, settled that strike. As one Member of this body, I am not willing to say that the Governor should not seek further to conciliate and arbitrate in this matter.

I do not want anything I say here to be construed to mean that I approve of the sit-down strike. I think it is illegal. But I am not willing to shoot down the men in the Chrysler plants in order to uphold the majesty of law. The majesty of law will not be as much injured by a little forbearance in this situation as it would be if troops were brought in and men were shot down.

No better, saner statement of the situation has been made than that issued yesterday by the Governor of Michigan and published throughout the country. I ask unanimous consent that the full statement of Governor Murphy in connection with this strike be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF MURPHY STATEMENT OPENING STRIKE CONFERENCE

There is probably no need for stating at length the conditions that exist in Detroit and to a less extent in other communities in the State.

Public officials and, I believe, the great majority of our people, regardless of political faith or affiliation, are gravely disturbed by the prevalence of disputes between workers and employers, and a disposition in some quarters to ignore the law and violate the security and freedom of individuals and corporations in the exercise of their personal and property rights.

Public authorities have shown a disposition to be reasonable and patient. It has been the aim and hope of the State government to avoid needless violence that might result in rancor and bitterness, in the hope that peaceful and prompt settlement of disputes might be facilitated, to the advantage of the innocent and neutral public as well as the parties directly concerned.

For it must not be overlooked that more important even than the interests of the parties directly involved and the prompt settlement of particular disputes is the maintenance of public order and respect for public authority, as represented by the police and the judicial tribunals.

When the authority of governmental agencies is continually flouted or defied, confidence in government is impaired, and outraged citizens prepare to take the law into their own hands; democratic rule is endangered, and the way is prepared for the rule of mobs or dictators; worst of all, labor movements and organizations are discredited, faith in liberal democratic government is permanently impaired, and social progress is impeded.

It is still my conviction that industrial disputes should be settled through friendly and peaceful negotiation, conducted in a spirit of reason and justice.

MUST BE REASONABLE

It is believed that this can be done in all cases if demands and attitudes are temperate and reasonable on both sides, and due consideration is given to the just interests of all parties concerned, including the general public.

While it is also important, and my firm conviction, as everyone knows, that we should employ all legitimate and lawful means to advance and protect those larger human interests which are commonly called human rights, and thereby secure wider enjoyment of personal liberty and individual happiness among our people, it should not be forgotten that personal liberty will be of little value to our people if the authority and integrity of our courts are not preserved and property rights are not protected.

The foregoing statements are made with a full realization that in many of these controversies there has been fault on both sides.

UNREGULATED SYSTEM BLAMED FOR TROUBLE

We may say that in a very large measure many of our troubles and disorders are due to injustices and unhealthful conditions that are inherent in an unregulated competitive system.

We may say also that the refusal of backward employers to recognize properly the right to collective bargaining has contributed in good measure to the present unfortunate situation.

In addition, it is a plain fact that unduly harsh working conditions and instances of extremely low wages cause unfavorable public reactions and often justifiably evoke sympathy for summary action by employees.

As responsible citizens it is our duty to find a remedy for such conditions and set up in the name of government the agencies for negotiation and adjudication of differences without unduly interfering with the operation of the American system of free enterprise and free competition.

DISTRIBUTION OF INCOME

Forces set in motion by the New Deal are already working definitely toward a wider and fairer distribution of the national income.

We should do our part in Michigan by seeking the correction of specific conditions here that need correction. But wrongs that exist cannot be corrected overnight, and no one should seek their correction by summary action that is prejudicial to the public interest and public authority.

In a free competitive system, the blame usually rests upon society at large, and faults should be corrected through orderly appeal to the representatives of organized democratic society, not by a resort to private force.

We must find a way to prevent these disorderly and unlawful methods of pursuing lawful and worthy objectives. We must find a way also of making them wholly unnecessary.

PREVENTION IS POSSIBLE

Surely this is possible in a democratic order as well as in a "fascist" order. We have a Governor and a legislature well disposed both toward labor and toward capital, anxious to have both interests prosper and to correct evils or abuses, willing to do so as far as this is reasonably and humanly possible in a political society organized on a basis of constitutional law and democratic principles.

As to the immediate problem of enforcing law observance and security for individual and property rights, I have conferred with certain officials who are charged with this responsibility.

We have means to enforce respect for public authority and we propose to use them with proper vigor if need be.

While I have consistently counseled resort to conference and negotiation, and sought to avoid the use of force, there is obviously a limit to this policy, if orderly government, as we know it here, is to go on.

DECLARES THAT STATE WILL PRESERVE ORDER

No one should assume or infer that the government of this State will forsake its responsibility to maintain order and protect citizens in the full exercise of their legal rights.

The Governor and other police officials have a sworn duty to perform in behalf of the people of this State; and they have no alternative but to perform it with all necessary vigor.

That is one of our problems, and it is a responsibility that cannot be ignored by public officials. It must be effectively met and handled by the executive and judicial agencies of the government, without interference by private groups or individuals, and with such assistance as may be required from the legislature and from citizens themselves.

At the same time there are other measures that may be taken, measures to facilitate and bring about a prompt solution of our immediate difficulties, as well as long-range measures to avoid a repetition of this situation.

There are grievances to be considered. They relate to working conditions in our shops and factories. They relate to the right to collective bargaining.

ALLEVIATE HARDSHIPS

We cannot achieve an ideal society at once. But we may perhaps do something at once to alleviate some of the hardships and the grosser injustices that have developed in our industrial and commercial life, and provide methods of correcting them as they arise, in an orderly and intelligent manner.

For I believe most men are fundamentally humane and amenable to an appeal to their innate sense of justice and reason, if reasonable and practical solutions can be offered to them.

Although at present we do not have appropriate public agencies in Michigan to deal with questions and disputes that arise in particular industries and business establishments, is it not possible to create semipublic agencies by voluntary action within our several industries, working through private, unofficial associations or organizations?

TRIBUNALS PROPOSED

It would seem feasible by cooperative action between organized employer and labor groups within the several categories of business and industry that may be affected or threatened by labor troubles, to establish committees or tribunals to deal with grievances that arise within their respective groups.

A neutral member might be added by joint selection or appointment by the mayor or other suitable public authority. I am thinking of existing bodies like the Retail Druggists Association, the hotel owners, the restaurateurs, the retail merchants, etc., and any corresponding groups.

Such committees or tribunals could hear specific complaints and by the mere act of hearing and pronouncing judgment could go far to establish working codes and standards practical in their operation and satisfactory to their employees.

CAUSES OF DISPUTES MIGHT BE ELIMINATED

General standards and principles might thus be established within each group that would be uniform and applicable to all, and remove causes for dispute and interruption of normal business.

With the experience of the N. R. A. to guide us, such associations or tribunals might be formed with reasonable dispatch.

Such committees could operate as conciliation agencies or mediation boards within particular industries or business groups. Their immediate function would be to meet the immediate situation.

They might also be developed into permanent arrangements that would accomplish some of the purposes of a State N. R. A., if that should appear useful, and might thus become the basis of a workable permanent plan in this State, workable because of natural development out of practical experience within industry.

If legislation were helpful or needed, it could doubtless be provided. Call it by any name you wish.

But it seems like a logical and orderly and practical way of meeting a practical situation.

Another method could be the establishment in each county or community where needed, especially where there are no groups already organized and available, of special mediation boards or committees, one for unorganized industries affected by labor disturbances.

These committees could hear and advise on grievances submitted to them, or could intervene in existing disputes and ask the parties to meet and confer with them in the hope of reaching peaceful settlements without suspension of work, with its attendant disorder and public inconvenience. Such committees could be appointed by mayors or other local officials.

ADVANTAGE OF PROGRAM

With such a program, with such facilities, with such assurance of reasonable opportunity to present grievances to semipublic agencies, both sides may be asked and expected in the meantime to refrain from unlawful or summary methods to force their demands, at the great inconvenience of the public and to the prejudice of private legal rights.

In this new industrial age, when the welfare of the whole communities, literally of a whole State with its several million inhabitants, is dependent on the recognition of the rights of workers and on the uninterrupted operation of the complicated modern economic mechanism, it is a grave matter for any man or group of men on the side of industry or labor to assume the right or responsibility to stop that mechanism at any point.

It is doubtful (if not unthinkable) whether any private individual, whatever his position or authority, should assume such a prerogative, or be permitted to exercise it, under modern conditions.

ADMINISTRATION READY FOR NECESSARY ACTION

Certainly there can be little occasion for it while the legislature is in session and we have a government in the hands of a friendly and sympathetic administration, ready and willing to take any practical and necessary action to ameliorate serious injustices and inequalities in our social and economic life.

The public interest in avoiding needless interruption of industry, commerce, and transportation, as well as assuring justice to workers, is paramount and supreme in a highly organized society like ours. If such interruptions cannot be avoided by democratic rule, the people will accept another kind of rule in preference to disorder and chaos.

NO "UNDUE RESTRICTION"

Without suggesting undue restrictions on freedom of labor to organize and act in its own interest, we may properly consider whether such organizations should be subject to some degree of regulation, and be required to confine their activities to matters of internal discipline, to the orderly and peaceful development of common objectives and programs, and their presentation, for approval and proper action, to the duly constituted public authorities, especially the legislature.

This is in accordance with the theory of representative, democratic government. It is an aspect of the general problem.

The matter is open for discussion, and I should like to hear what any of you might have in mind to suggest that would help us meet the situation. Possibly out of our discussion we may be able to develop some definite proposals for a prompt solution of our difficulties and the correction or amelioration of the intolerable conditions that have come to pass.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McADOO in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. BORAH conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 217) providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 217) providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art, and it was signed by the Vice President.

TRANSPORTATION OF NATURAL GAS BY PIPE LINE

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. President, it will be necessary for me to return to my home State on Sunday afternoon, somewhat against the advice of many good friends, but I am going back to Michigan, and there is one matter which I feel I ought to bring to the attention of the Senate before I go.

Yesterday I introduced in the Senate a bill, Senate bill 1919, designed to establish a control in the Federal Power Commission over the transportation of natural gas by pipe line. I shall not now take the time of the Senate to enter into a lengthy discussion of the bill. Let me say that the bill was largely drafted by a committee appointed by Mayor LaGuardia, of New York, chairman of the mayors' conference. This committee was headed by John W. Smith, president of the Common Council of the City of Detroit, which city at the present time is obtaining its main supply of natural gas from the Texas Panhandle gas area.

I ask that at this point in my remarks a statement concerning the bill and a section-by-section explanation of it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the request of the Cities Alliance I have introduced in the Senate a bill which has for its ultimate objective a Nation-wide reduction of gas rates and a saving of many millions of dollars to the American public each year. If enacted by the Congress the bill will establish regulation over interstate natural-gas pipe lines by the Federal Power Commission, will promote conservation of natural gas through interstate compacts, and will aid in removing monopolistic restraints from the natural-gas industry.

The bill follows closely a measure approved at a conference of Midwest municipal officials at Cleveland, Ohio, on February 10. It is based upon findings by the Federal Trade Commission, and results from 2 years' investigation by midwestern cities. For example, more than 75 cities of Michigan and Ohio alone are cooperating in this program to reduce gas rates.

I am introducing the bill at the particular request of Mr. John W. Smith, former mayor and now president of Detroit's Common Council, national chairman of the Cities Alliance, and also chairman of the natural gas committee of the United States Conference of Mayors through appointment by the conference president, Mayor F. H. LaGuardia, of New York. Mr. Smith visited me last week, accompanied by Councilman Eugene Van Antwerp, of Detroit, and by Councilman William C. Reed, chairman of the Cleveland council's public-utilities committee, and also chairman of the Ohio division of the Cities Alliance. Mr. Reed is likewise a member of the natural gas committee of the mayors' conference. Detroit and Cleveland are the Nation's two largest cities receiving natural gas transported interstate and distributed unmixed with artificial gas.

I favor this legislation because it is designed to protect rate payers and utility investors, to conserve a precious national resource, and because it also fosters sound competitive enterprise within the industry. It prohibits banking control of interstate pipe lines, opposes the acquisition of excessive gas acreage to shut out potential competition, and permits independent pipe lines to compete with entrenched holding companies in supplying additional natural gas to present markets.

Members of Congress may well anticipate that utility lobbyists will train their heaviest guns on this bill. While the bill represents the municipal gas consumers' viewpoint, natural-gas producers and the industry generally are invited to present their views. I would emphasize to the Congress, however, and particularly to public-utility investors, that this legislation has been made necessary in large part by the conduct of holding-company officials themselves.

Consider that four great corporations dominate natural-gas transportation in this country and you will recognize the need for protecting independent competition as well as consumers' interests. Three of those four corporations are Cities Service Co., headed by Henry L. Doherty; Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation, headed by Philip G. Gossler; and Standard Oil (New Jersey) Co., headed by Christy Payne.

The Cities Alliance alleges that these three men, back in 1930, embarked on a program designed to wreck an independent rival, the Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co., and to prevent it from transporting cheap natural gas from the Texas Panhandle to Indianapolis and Detroit. Examine the records of the Federal Trade Commission on that subject, and you will understand why America must be insured against a recurrence of such economic banditry.

Merely as a reminder of the arrogance and aggression that has characterized efforts of the natural-gas monopolists to suppress competition and maintain exorbitant gas rates, I am appending to this statement the text of telegrams sent by Henry L. Doherty to the National City Co. of New York, in protest against financial aid being extended to the rival Panhandle Eastern. The telegrams have been published by the Federal Trade Commission and should be read by every citizen. Some day they will be exhibited with other Americana of our time under the title "It Can't Happen Here—Any More!"

If enacted, this bill approved by the Cities Alliance should also remove the causes of the enormous waste of natural gas in the Texas Panhandle, a waste which at one time exceeded the domestic consumption of natural gas throughout the Nation. That tragic loss may recur, unless the Congress and the States are forehanded in reaching conservation compacts. This bill not only sets up the machinery for a compact but prohibits the interstate transportation of natural gas that may be produced in violation of such a compact.

The bill does not usurp the powers of State regulatory commissions. It merely extends effective supervision into the twilight zone where State authority vanishes—across a State line. It provides for regulation of the price at which natural gas, transported interstate, may be wholesaled at a "city gate." It does not seek to regulate the retail rates. Neither does it seek to regulate prices at which natural gas may be sold to industry in any instance.

From State Representative Edward H. Fenlon, of Michigan, chairman of the legislative committee investigating natural-gas problems, I have received a telegram stating, "All agree interstate regulation would be a benefit."

Mr. Howell Van Auken, member of the Michigan Public Utilities Commission, has wired as follows:

"Consider that this field should receive Federal regulation. My understanding that single States probably have no regulatory authority over original construction interstate pipe lines and are limited to regulations after gas passes into local distribution system, also that single States cannot exclude importation outside gas. Desirable that forum exist where States could be heard on such matters."

In this same connection I quote from a resolution adopted by the Indiana Legislature in 1935, in which the Congress was asked "to take such action as may be necessary to place the said (natural gas) industry under effective regulation to the end that the people of this country may enjoy the use of this great natural resource at fair and reasonable rates."

The cities' problem of obtaining reasonable retail rates will be much simplified if they are enabled, through this bill, to establish an acceptable "city-gate" price. This vital issue confronts every city dependent upon natural gas brought from another State. In order to cite the wide benefits available under this bill, consider its application to various municipalities:

Cleveland, Akron, Youngstown, Canton: These cities will be aided in determining the actual cost of natural-gas production and transportation from the West Virginia gas fields. At present one Standard Oil subsidiary sells the gas to an affiliate for 38½ cents per thousand cubic feet, although it is transported only a short distance to the Ohio River. That arbitrary price is preventing a reduction of retail gas rates and is not subject to effective State regulation. Other cities of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, New York, West Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, all dependent upon an Appalachian natural-gas supply, can be similarly aided.

Detroit: A second new pipe line can be constructed to Detroit from the Southwest and the natural gas wholesaled at the city gate on a competitive basis, without necessitating a second campaign of antitrust law enforcement. This additional supply will make possible increased industrial sales in such volume that domestic gas bills will be substantially lowered. This is possible under the "Detroit plan" whereby gas company profits are shared annually with domestic consumers, a method of automatic rate regulations without parallel in America today.

Indianapolis: Its city-owned gas utility would also be enabled to obtain a cheap natural-gas supply from a second pipe line to Detroit, without being forced to return a "yes-or-no" decision on the purchase question within a 48-hour period. Such an ultimatum was delivered to the city by a major pipe-line company about 2 years ago.

St. Louis: The bill would help that soot-bedevilled city to obtain an additional natural-gas supply and extend the use of straight natural gas to home heating at reduced prices. To date the city's efforts in that direction have been frustrated. During the period that Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation dominated the management of Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co. natural-gas service was refused to the city on the ground that St. Louis "belonged" to Standard Oil. A Federal court has since removed Columbia from domination over Panhandle Eastern and restored that system to independent status.

Kansas City: The bill should also prove helpful to municipal officials negotiating for lower gas rates from the Cities Service subsidiary there. For example, the consumers might be enabled to obtain an auxiliary natural-gas supply at a cheap "dump load" price from the Panhandle Eastern system, which is now managed by a Federal trustee, who is obligated to respect the antitrust laws.

Such procedure at Kansas City would, of course, raise once again the terrifying ghost of competition which Mr. Doherty sought to quiet by his telegrams, but I have been informed by the Cities Alliance that a substantial volume of natural gas is available in the Panhandle Eastern main line at Louisburg, Kans., just south of Kansas City, Mo., due to the fact that the pipe-line dimensions extending eastward toward Detroit decrease from 24 inch to 22 inch at that point.

At the present time Mr. Doherty's pipe-line company sells natural gas to Mr. Doherty's distribution company at Kansas City for 40 cents per thousand cubic feet, whereas natural gas from the same producing area is carried three times as far—1,200 miles to Detroit—and wholesaled to the Detroit City Gas Co. for only 33½ cents. This circumstance may explain why the Cities Service Co. was so disturbed by the threat of competition 7 years ago, when Mr. Doherty predicted that completion of the independent Panhandle Eastern pipe-line project would "inevitably smash rates to complete demoralization."

[Western Union]

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, September 21, 1930.

CHARLES E. MITCHELL,

National City Co., New York, N. Y.:

The report in the New York Times of Friday morning to the effect that your company would finance the Parish natural gas line was a great shock to me. The building of this line is bound to seriously affect the credit of several important companies and perhaps the entire public-utility business, and it is unthinkable to me that you would, if you were properly informed, permit your company to finance an enterprise which is itself of questionable safety and therefore a menace to the public-utility business, also an assault on existing utilities and other projects well under way when this project was announced. Your people knew that this project was an assault on other utilities and plans and I am at a loss to know why they joined partnership in a project which, according to established rules of public-utility ethics, is classed as a raid. The Columbia went into this enterprise in spite of a previous understanding had with me, but tried to justify their negotiations with Parish on grounds of fear that Parish would raid their territory. The Columbia Co. may feel they have justification in the claim of the danger of competition to support this enterprise, but I know of nothing that justifies your company in supporting this enterprise.

I am compelled to emphatically protest against what Parish proposed to do, and those supporting Parish are making it possible for him to carry out his plans, and to do so will inevitably smash rates to complete demoralization throughout the entire district reached by any of the concerns involved, and, while regretting the situation, I am prepared to meet this assault, if necessary, with counter assaults and mean to lay my views of this matter before each of the representatives of all of the public-utility companies and ask them for their support. I have an opinion that amounts to a conviction that this project will never be able to earn a return on the money invested. I have felt it my duty to lay this much of the facts before you and to urge you to give careful consideration to the matter if you have not already committed yourself irrevocably to the enterprise. We most sincerely wish for continued pleasant relations with your company and will gladly give you any detailed information, but aside from the necessity of making this protest a matter of record we have no wish to force our views upon you.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1930.

Mr. HENRY L. DOHERTY,
Chateau Laurier, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada:

Our action in connection with the Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line was directed toward working out as constructive a solution as possible of a disturbed situation, rendered so by others before it was brought to us for consideration. We see no threat to other companies or the utility industry if they and it truly desire harmonious relations, are willing to give as well as take, and recognize established factors in the situation. The arrangement to which we are a party we consider to be a much greater step in that direction than another transaction which had been offered to Parish's company.

We are informed and believe that no one in the recent arrangement wishes to demoralize any situation. We feel confident that the Columbia Co. has acted in the best way possible and advisable under all the circumstances, and we are sure that they have every disposition to be constructive.

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, September 23, 1930.

C. E. MITCHELL,
National City Co., New York, N. Y.:

I thank you for your message, but I am still compelled to emphatically object to the part your company has played in this matter and the way your company has played its part, and I feel it is my duty to lay the matter before all of the public-utility organizations with my protest. Your people either did or did not know about the Eastern Gas pipe line under construction by us. If they did not know about it, they should have known about it, and others should know that your company did not know and yet assumed to be able to decide what should or should not be done. If they did not know about it, they should have consulted with us before giving their pledge of moral and financial support to Parish. I have spent my life in the public-utility business and my associates are also skilled by long experience in the public-utility business, but I must object to the extreme immodesty of your men in assuming that they can step into a situation of this sort in which we have pledged our reputation and expenditure of millions of capital, and do so without consulting with us and assume they could do what they assumed we could not do and could do this without then asking about our plans.

They must have known we had some plans or they must have assumed that we had no plans. They made no effort to learn whether we had any plans or not and presumably cared nothing about our plans. We are glad to be assured that you are willing to give as well as take, but in this instance we neither asked you to give nor did we consent that you should take, and our position in the matter certainly entitled us to be consulted before you bolstered up the credit of an ill-considered raiding enterprise and joined partnership with a man whose performance has made him, in my opinion, a bad risk from a business and moral standpoint. I realize that this statement may be libelous if untrue; but I think if anybody chooses to start a suit against me, it will make it an easy matter for me to prove by court evidence that your company in this instance has not insisted on the same standards as were demanded in the back years when your institution was being built up in reputation and magnitude. You know I have always held you in high esteem in those various lines where you are qualified to speak and enjoy the advice of a qualified staff, but I cannot allow you to assert that without any attempt to learn the facts that your off-hand opinion would be better than the conclusion reached by myself and associates and based upon months of investigation by our trained staffs. You say you and the Columbia Co. have done it for the best and assure us there need be no lack of harmony. You, perhaps, are not in position to know what we are willing or not willing to concede for the sake of harmony.

Mr. Parish proposes to take our markets in Kansas; and even if the Columbia is willing to surrender their Ohio markets to us, this does not eliminate all of the other disturbing factors in the situation. Frankly, I think your young men have made a bad mistake in this matter and the sooner you acknowledge this, at least to yourselves, the better it will be. I have tried to be temperate in this matter, and if you still subscribe to the views expressed in your message, I do not see that we can get anywhere. I am still of each and every opinion expressed in my first message; and if only for reasons of personal friendship for you, I regret to say that I have no choice except to regard this as being an assault on us by Parish in which you voluntarily and without justification and without consulting us have given Parish your support. There are endless possibilities for trouble in this matter, and not the least of which is the fact that people who would have shunned this enterprise, both on account of its character and its plan, might now be willing to buy out Parish and become the partner of your company and the Columbia Co., and then Parish might be found building another line for somebody else to buy.

HENRY L. DOHERTY.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1930.

Mr. HENRY L. DOHERTY,
Chateau Laurier, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada:

Your telegram of yesterday received. I see nothing to add to my message of yesterday. As you doubtless know, the contract was signed last week. I understand Columbia has communicated with your company and I hope that a harmonious arrangement may result.

C. E. MITCHELL.

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, September 24, 1930.

CHAS. E. MITCHELL,
National City Bank, New York, N. Y.:

Our Mr. W. A. Jones has arrived here and says that our people in New York are very much disturbed by what has transpired regarding this Parrish transaction and naturally do not want this situation to disturb the pleasant relations we have had with your company, but I have told him my views on the matter, and he is now not only in complete harmony with me in the matter but has talked with our people in New York, and they also see that the position I have taken is a matter of necessity, but they want me to tell you some of the reasons for this.

Parrish has claimed he was not trying to injure us and yet as soon as this deal was announced he or his officials went to the Kansas City Star and said this deal would enable them to give Kansas City cheap gas, and we are now being subjected to the merciless castigation of that paper, based on the support you and the Columbia have given Parrish. We are already in the position of being forced to sell gas for 14 cents in Kansas City, and if cheap gas is a good thing for Kansas City, then Parrish and his partners should sell cheap gas in their markets. I made a deal with Crawford and Gossler last summer, and they have recently expressed the intention of abrogating it. In the last interview I had with them they had to admit that what they are now proposing to do was in violation of our previous understanding and their only justification was the statement that they thought I was joking. I have been compelled to take the matter up with you because if we waived our previous understanding and reach a new one they could just as well come back at any time and again announce a change of plans and again say they thought I was joking.

HENRY L. DOHERTY.

GENERAL PURPOSES OF THE BILL

This bill has two chief purposes:

First, it provides a method whereby States producing large volumes of natural gas may join in a conservation compact with the consent of the Congress. Accordingly, the bill (a) prohibits the interstate transportation of natural gas produced in violation of a federally ratified compact, (b) authorizes a Federal Commission to assemble and transmit to Congress all pertinent information, its conclusions and recommendations relating to proposed compacts, and (c) further directs said Commission to assist the several States in the successful administration of the compact.

Second, this bill establishes Federal regulation of interstate natural-gas pipe lines. Accordingly, it empowers a Federal commission (a) to prevent undue preference or discrimination by pipeline companies in their acceptance or purchase of natural gas for transportation from the field, across State lines, to the markets, (b) to compel pipe-line companies to furnish natural gas to any city or town applying therefor, and (c) to determine the fairness of rates charged by interstate pipe-line companies for natural gas sold to distributing companies for resale to domestic consumers.

Other minor purposes of this bill are contained in a detailed analysis of its provisions, which follows:

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

Section 1. Title of the bill and its general purpose

Section 1 declares that the bill may be cited as the Natural Gas Act of 1937, and outlines its general purpose in these words, "To aid the several States in the proper conservation, orderly production and procurement of natural gas for interstate commerce, and to regulate its transportation, sale, and exchange in interstate commerce in order to insure its fair and equitable distribution and marketing and for other purposes."

Section 2. Declaration of policy and purpose

Subsection (a) contains a declaration of policy; subsection (b) points to the "wasteful, uneconomical and inequitable practices" prevailing in the natural-gas industry, "all of which are highly detrimental to the public interest"; subsection (c) states the necessity for Federal regulation of "that part of said natural-gas and natural-gas pipe-line industry which is not subject to regulation by the several States; subsection (d) emphasizes that an integral part of the Federal policy is "so to regulate as to avoid the evils and abuses of monopoly."

Section 3. Definitions

This section contains definitions of (1) "person", (2) "corporation", (3) "municipality", (4) "State", (5) natural gas", (6) "natural-gas pipe-line company", (7) "natural-gas pipe line", (8) "interstate transmission", (9) "field gathering line", (10) "low-pressure-distribution lines", (11) "commission"—to be designated by the Congress, (12) "State commission", (13) "public utility", (14) the verb "control", and (15) "depreciation."

Section 4. Standards of application and jurisdiction

Subsection (a) sets the standard of administration of provisions of this act as "the public interest, convenience, and necessity"; subsection (b) applies the act's provisions to the procurement of and subsequent dealings with natural gas in interstate commerce, including pertinent contracts, agreements, etc., but excluding natural-gas production and commerce within a State, and natural gas procured solely for use and consumption of procurer or transmitter, not for resale.

Subsection (c) outlines the scope of Commission jurisdiction; subsection (d) identified natural gas pipe lines as public utilities; subsection (e) extends jurisdiction to "every person who owns, controls, or operates facilities, or who makes contracts involving the use thereof."

Sections 5 to 8, inclusive. Conservation by compact among States

See first paragraph under "General purposes."

Sections 9 to 11, inclusive. Regulation of interstate natural gas pipe lines

See second paragraph under "General purposes."

Section 12. Rates and charges; schedules; suspension of new rates

Subsection (a) imposes upon natural-gas companies the duty of charging just and reasonable rates; and, under the provisions of subsection (b), undue preferences or advantages are prohibited.

Subsection (c) requires the filing of true copies of all contracts for "lease and royalty agreements of gas lands (unless excused by Commission for cause), for the purchase of natural gas, for the transportation of natural gas, and for the sale or delivery of natural gas."

Subsection (d) requires the filing of schedules and contracts relating to all rates and charges subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission, and subsection (e), no change may be made in such rates except after 30 days' notice.

Section 13. Fixing rates and charges; determination of cost of production or transmission

Subsection (a) declares: "Whenever the Commission, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon complaint, shall find that any rate, charge, or classification, demanded, observed, charged, or collected by any natural-gas pipe-line company in connection with any service rendered or to be rendered in the transmission or sale of natural gas in mains in interstate commerce, subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission, or that any rule, regulation, practice, or contract affecting such rate, charge, or classification is unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or preferential, the Commission shall determine the just and reasonable rate, charge, classification, rule, regulation, practice, or contract to be thereafter observed and in force, and shall prescribe the same by order."

Subsection (b) declares: "The Commission upon its own motion, or upon the request of any State commission, whenever it can do so without prejudice to the efficient and proper conduct of its affairs, may investigate and determine the cost of the production or transmission of natural gas, either independently, or in cooperation with the State authorities severally concerned."

Section 14. Ascertainment of cost of property

This section authorizes the Commission to investigate and ascertain the actual legitimate cost of property, depreciation, and other necessary facts for rate-making purposes.

Section 15. Accounts, records, and memoranda

Subsection (a) requires natural-gas companies to make and keep such accounts, records, and memoranda as the Commission may direct. However, natural-gas companies are not relieved by this subsection from the duty of keeping such accounts as may be prescribed under the laws of any State.

Subsection (b) authorizes the Commission to inspect and examine accounts, records, and memoranda of natural-gas companies and to have access to the premises of such companies when necessary for that purpose.

Subsection (c) subjects the accounts of any person who controls, directly or indirectly, a natural-gas company, subject to the Commission's jurisdiction, to examination by the Commission.

Section 16. Rates of depreciation

Subsection (a) authorizes the Commission to require proper depreciation accounting and to determine and fix adequate depreciation rates, such rates to include amortization. The depreciation charges which a State commission may fix for rate purposes would not be affected by this section.

Subsection (b) authorizes the Commission, after hearing, "to determine the adequacy or inadequacy of the gas reserves held by any pipe-line company, or by anyone for it, including its owned or leased properties and royalty contracts, and the Commission may, after hearing, determine the reasonableness or propriety of the inclusion of all delay rentals or other forms of rental or compensation for unoperated lands and leases, in operating expenses, capital, or surplus."

Subsection (c) requires the Commission to receive and consider the views of State commissions before prescribing depreciation rates.

Section 17. Periodic and special reports

The Commission by this section is authorized to require periodic and special reports which may be necessary for the proper administration of the act, and the manner and form in which the reports shall be made. It is declared to be unlawful for any person willfully to hinder or obstruct the making or filing of any information, report, or account required to be made, filed, or kept by the Commission. The annual reports shall become public records; the facts in any other report may be furnished to the State commissions.

Section 18. Prohibition of certain practices

Subsection (a) prohibits any officer or director of any natural-gas pipe-line company from receiving a profit from security financing by his company, or from his company's dealings in real or personal property, or from his company's gas sales or gas-purchase contracts, or to participate in the making or paying of any dividends of such natural-gas pipe-line company from any funds properly included in capital account, or from any other source than earned income, except as to liquidating dividends.

Section 19. Prohibition of banking control

This section provides that after 6 months from the date of the taking effect of this act it shall be unlawful for any bank, trust company, banking association, or banking firm, in any manner, to control the actions or policies of any natural-gas pipe-line company.

Section 20. Complaints

Under this section any State, municipality, or State commission may complain to the Commission of anything done or omitted to be done by any natural-gas company in contravention of the provisions of the bill.

Section 21. Investigations by Commission; attendance of witnesses; depositions

The Commission is authorized by subsection (a) to investigate any violation of the provisions of the Natural Gas Act, and may make available to State commissions any information concerning the matters to which the act relates.

Subsections (b) and (c) provide for the issuance of subpenas and the attendance of witnesses, and in the event of refusal to attend or produce books or records, the Commission is given recourse to the courts. A willful failure to attend as a witness or to produce books or records is made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than 1 year, or both.

Subsections (d), (e), and (f) authorize the taking of testimony by deposition, either in the United States or in a foreign country. Witnesses before the Commission and witnesses giving depositions as well as the person taking the deposition are entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

No person is excused from giving testimony because it may be self-incriminating, but under subsection (g) the person so testifying may not thereafter be subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction or thing concerning which he is compelled to testify or to produce evidence. This exemption does not, however, relieve a party from prosecution for perjury.

Section 22. Hearings; rules of procedure

Subsection (a) provides that hearings under the Natural Gas Act may be held before the Commission or any member or representative designated by the Commission. It authorizes the Commission to admit as a party to any proceeding any interested State, State commission, municipality, or private party in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe.

Subsection (b) authorizes the Commission to adopt rules of practice and procedure governing all its hearings and proceedings. It provides also that no informality in any proceeding shall invalidate an order or regulation issued under the authority of the act.

Section 23. Administrative powers of Commission; rules, regulations, and orders

This section contains a general grant of administrative powers to perform necessary acts, issue orders, rules and regulations, and prescribe the form of documents to be filed with the Commission.

Section 24. Rehearings; court review of orders

Subsection (a) authorizes parties to a proceeding before the Commission to apply for a rehearing within 30 days after the issuance of an order by which such party is aggrieved. The Commission is given power to abrogate or modify its order upon such application. Unless it acts upon the application within 30 days, the application may be deemed to have been denied. No proceeding for court review of an order of the Commission is to be brought unless an application for rehearing shall have been filed.

Subsection (b) provides for review of the Commission's orders by the circuit courts of appeals and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. No objection to any order is to be considered by the court unless it was urged before the Commission in the application for rehearing unless there was reasonable ground for failure to raise it on the application. Findings of the Commission as to the facts, if supported by substantial evidence, are made conclusive, but the court may upon application order additional evidence to be taken before the Commission. The judgment of the court is subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification.

Section 25. Enforcement of acts; regulations; and orders

This section authorizes the Commission to bring a civil action in the proper district court to enjoin acts or practices in violation of the act or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder and to enforce compliance therewith.

Subsection (b) confers upon the courts of the United States jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding compliance with the act and rules, regulations, or orders thereunder.

Section 26. General penalties

Subsection (a) imposes a criminal penalty of fine, imprisonment, or both, upon any person who willfully and knowingly violates the provisions of the act.

Subsection (b) provides for a fine for violations of the rules, regulations, and orders issued under authority of the act.

Section 27. Jurisdiction of offenses; enforcement of liabilities and duties

This section imposes appropriate jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States over cases arising under the act.

Section 28. Conflict of jurisdiction

This section gives priority of jurisdiction to the Public Utility Act of 1935 with respect to orders issued by the Commission under this Natural Gas Act, except where the Securities and Exchange Commission has already exempted a person from requirements of the Public Utility Act. Where the Securities and Exchange Commission exercises prior jurisdiction, all reports of such person shall, upon request, be made available to this Commission, in aid of its administration of this act.

Section 29. Separability of provisions

This is the usual separability section saving the rest of the act in case of a decision holding any part invalid.

SIT-DOWN STRIKES AND INTERSTATE CORPORATIONS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I quite agree with what has been said by the Senators who have occupied the floor this afternoon since I entered the Chamber when the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was speaking.

This is no time for any person in public life to insist upon any legalistic pound of flesh in the attempt to solve this critical situation which confronts our country. It is eminently a time for patience, forbearance, and coolheadedness; but it is also a time for all of us, in and out of public office, to attempt to assess the responsibility for the conditions which exist.

I rise only for the purpose of emphasizing briefly the remarks of the Senator from Idaho and the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. The fact is that the monopolistic practices which have been condemned upon this floor for 50 years or more are rendered possible only by virtue of a grant or grants, as the Senator from Idaho said, from some State or from the Federal Government to aggregations of capital. No natural person could become a successful monopolist in this country without the use of corporate devices.

It is also true, as the Senator from Alabama has said, that by reason of judicial construction there has developed in the United States a sort of "no man's land" in which the State authority is not recognized and in which the Federal authority is not asserted. It seems to me that the cause of this situation is as clear as day. We shall understand it readily if only we bring our minds to a recognition of the fact, which no person can deny, that 90 percent of that commerce among the States which was committed by the Federal Constitution into the hands of the Federal Government to regulate is carried on by corporations created by the States.

State governments which have neither the power nor the jurisdiction, and which, in addition, have no desire to regulate commerce among the States, create these artificial entities which dominate the commerce of the entire land. Nay, more than that, the States of the Union have created corporations which control not only the commerce of the United States but which are engaged in a dominant degree in international commerce as well.

When we recognize the fact that commerce among the States is carried on by these creatures of State governments over which the public exercises no effective regulation, because the States which create them have neither jurisdiction nor interest and the Federal Government does not act effectively, and when we realize the artificial character of these entities we shall begin to understand what the trouble is.

We talk about sit-down strikes. We talk about the sit-down strike in the General Motors plant in the State of Michigan. How many of us when we are thinking about it stop to realize that the General Motors Corporation, with 60 or 65 or 70 plants scattered throughout the United States, is not a Michigan corporation? It is a corporation created by another State far from the district in which the strike was called, the State of New Jersey; a corporation the employees of which number almost a quarter of a million; a corporation the stockholders of which number about 350,000 and reside in every State of the Union.

THE MODERN ECONOMIC STATE

The raw materials with which this great corporation works come from all sections of the earth, and there is scarcely a single field of productive enterprise which does not produce those materials. The cars that are manufactured by General Motors contain cotton and rubber, wool and leather, copper and steel and lumber, and a score of other commodities from the farms, ranches, and mines of every State in the Union. The same is true of the Chrysler Corporation.

Yet we pretend to think that these corporate entities can be governed by the rules that apply to natural persons and that their activities are not a matter of national concern. Perhaps I should not say that we continue to make this pretense, for now it is dawning upon the minds of all of the people of the land that the business of the interstate corporations is a matter of national concern.

The truth is that the modern corporation which carries on the business and commercial life of the American people has become an economic state. It is not in any sense a private business as private business is understood by natural persons. It is in a very real sense a public business not only because of its effect upon the public by reason of the huge numbers of persons it employs and the huge numbers of persons who supply its capital, but because the modern corporation is actually not governed and directed by the persons who own it. By far the great majority of the stockholders of the huge interstate corporation exercise no control over and assert no responsibility for their property. On the other hand hundreds of thousands of their employees are likewise without any voice in the direction of the policy of the corporation upon the activities of which they depend for a livelihood.

WHAT IS A CORPORATION?

We seem to have forgotten what a corporation is and what its powers have been. The Supreme Court of the United States in a notable case, which has never been reversed and which is still the law of the land, described the corporation in language a good deal clearer than that which I could use. In the case of Paul v. Virginia (75 U. S. 181), Mr. Justice Field said this:

> Now a grant of corporate existence is a grant of special privileges to the corporators, enabling them to act for certain designated purposes as a single individual, and exempting them (unless otherwise specially provided) from individual liability. The corporation—> being a mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created.

But these great interstate corporations operate throughout the length and breadth of the land, far beyond the limits of the States which created them, because of the fact that the Federal Constitution gave to the United States Government the power to regulate the field of commerce in which they are engaged, and, therefore, they have been enabled to escape the restraint of the laws of the States into which they have extended their operations by pleading that they are engaged in interstate commerce.

Fifty years or more ago Congress endeavored to put an end to the continuing concentration of economic power and wealth in the hands of a few. By the passage of the Sherman antitrust law the Congress of the United States declared its purpose to prevent combinations and monopolies. That has been and is now the will of the American people. But all during that time the enforcement of that will has been rendered practically impossible because the Federal Government has not exercised the full power which it has to prescribe the form and powers of corporations organized to carry on interstate commerce. Corporations created by the States, by going to the several States for charters with broader and broader powers, have been enabled to evade the purpose and the intent of the Federal antitrust law and the effect even of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

CONGRESS HAS POWER TO ACT

It is not my purpose this afternoon to enter into any lengthy discussion of the remedy, but it seems to me that it should be pointed out here and to the public at large that as the Senator from Idaho says, we have the solution in our own hands if we are only willing to exercise it. A corporation exists only by reason of a grant from the representatives of the people. No corporation can exist without such a grant. It seems to me to be perfectly clear that since the Federal Constitution has given to the Federal Government the power to regulate commerce among the States, and since these corporate entities are instrumentalities of that commerce, then the United States may and should by law undertake through a system of Federal charters and franchises to prescribe exactly what special privileges corporations may exercise. It is our duty to the general public to do so. To our failure to have done so in the past may be ascribed the conditions with which we are now confronted.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Has not the Supreme Court, by certain opinions that it has handed down, written into the law that, notwithstanding the Congress has the right to regulate interstate commerce and may be exercising that power, it must not do it in such a way as to interfere even indirectly with the rights of the States?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, the Supreme Court has erected quite a barrier of "burdens" and "direct and indirect" influences which have no constitutional basis whatsoever, but the Supreme Court has never passed upon the right of the Federal Government to require licenses and charters of the kind I mention.

Mr. MINTON. What good will it do the Federal Government to license or charter corporations if it could not further reach into the States in which they are actually doing business and attempt to control the manner in which they do business? I am sure that is what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think that would be just exactly the way it should be done and ought to be done.

Mr. MINTON. Then would we not again encounter the decision of the Supreme Court in the first child-labor case and in another case, in which they held that Congress could not do that thing because it would be indirectly doing what is left by the Constitution to the States to do, that is, to control manufacture?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I doubt very much whether any of the cases mentioned would apply to a law such as I suggest.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I think the Senator knows I am very much in sympathy with his objective and with the theory that underlies the proposal in his bill, but I should like to ask him if he thinks, in the light of the long line of decisions by the Supreme Court involving the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment, that a measure such as he suggests, if enacted into law, would be safe from the effect of those decisions?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator that I feel reasonably certain that a competent lawyer could convince even the present Supreme Court that such a law is valid and constitutional. The precedents which Senators fear have no bearing whatever on the problems.

Mr. BONE. There might be such a lawyer in the country. I hope there is.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to say a word first in regard to portions of the able argument of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. The cases to which he refers as coming up from the States and in which the court held void certain statutes reached the Supreme Court under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Those cases could never have reached the Supreme Court of the United States during the first 70 years of the existence of this Government. The fathers intended that the States should do what the able Senator from Alabama says he desires they should do, and that is to deal with their internal affairs or their domestic affairs according to their own judgment and according to their own discretion, and in that doctrine I heartily concur. But there came a time, immediately after the Civil War, when the leaders of the Nation at that time formulated a plan to take away from the States that discretion and that judgment which had been reposed in them prior to the Civil War.

The fourteenth amendment was grounded in distrust of the capacity of the people of the respective States to attend to their own business. It was based upon suspicion and fear as to the competency of the people of the States to deal with their respective affairs. That was all contrary to the idea which controlled the action of the fathers when they framed the Constitution; and, as a result, there has been created, to a large extent, what is a "no man's land" in constitutional government in the United States. There are certain things which apparently neither the Federal Government can do, because they are of intrastate nature nor can the State governments do because they run counter to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as found in the fourteenth amendment.

I heartily agree that the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment results, to a certain extent, in calling into action the economic views of the courts. In my opinion, it is impossible to execute the fourteenth amendment under the due-process clause without calling into action, to a certain extent, the economic views of the members of the Court, for the reason that——

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in a moment. For the reason that the States are forbidden to pass any law which will deprive a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. What is due process of law? It has never been defined; it cannot be defined; it has no definition which guides the legislature or the court. "Due process of law" is gathered from a world of precedents, coming down through history, to be applied to a particular case that comes before the court. I say that is an impossible duty to impose upon a court, insofar as it relates to substantial legislation. It should never have been imposed upon it. For instance, here is the great State of New York, with its thirteen-odd million people, of all races and tongues, with its great leaders, with its wealth, both agricultural and industrial, with its great newspapers, with its publishing houses, and with everything that makes a great society and a great community a republic within itself, capable of determining for itself its domestic concerns better than can be done by any other tribunal that can be created on earth. The result ought to be that when the judgment of the State as to the wisdom of a social or economic measure is concluded it should be binding upon the Government of the United States and binding upon the State.

For illustration, take the minimum-wage law. The people of the State of New York worked out a minimum-wage law. It met with the approval of the State; with the approval of the legislature; and it met with the approval of the Governor.

Why, under any theory of popular government, under any theory of local self-government, should not that law be permitted to stand? Yet it is passed on to the consideration of a tribunal of another sovereignty, under the nebulous, vague, undefined, and indefinable due-process-of-law clause, and it is there declared void by a vote of 5 to 4. It does not make any difference what the Court may be, that will likely happen under that kind of a law.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, it was 20 years after the fourteenth amendment was adopted, and after it first went to the Supreme Court, before the Supreme Court was willing to reach out and take hold of the power which was imposed upon it by the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in a moment. One of the great Justices—and he was a great Justice, and is a great Justice, so recognized by all the world now—said in substance: "The fourteenth amendment, if construed as is insisted we shall construe it, will work a complete revolution in our entire system of government"; and so it did. It ought to be taken out of the Constitution. It ought to be rewritten. The duty is upon us and upon the people of the United States to turn back to the States that which is essential to their sovereign existence. The fault is not with the Court; the fault is with us; the fault is with the lawmaking body, which has the power to submit proposed constitutional amendments. If we would do our duty, there would be less reason to criticize others.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator believe that due process meant anything more than judicial procedure?

Mr. BORAH. In my opinion the first decisions of the Supreme Court were sound, that it meant nothing more than due process of law, but when Mr. Conkling appeared before the Court with the records of the committee which framed it, showing that it was the intent of the members of that committee—which I call the "Committee of Public Safety", as a similar committee was called in the French Revolution—to include not only procedural matters but substantive matters, the Court finally held to that effect. It was not until 1887, about 20 years after the fourteenth amendment was adopted, that the Supreme Court finally held that the fourteenth amendment covered substantive legislation. Up to that time it had been of the opinion that it covered only procedural matters.

I have recently introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Under my proposed amendment due process of law would be confined to procedure; it would be confined within the limits where it was confined throughout the history of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence until 1887, and where it ought to be confined. I have just said I felt due process ought to have been confined by the courts to matters of procedure. I ought to say, however, that under the broad terms of the fourteenth amendment it would be difficult not to include substantive matters. But we can confine it to procedural matters by amending it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator has more or less answered the question I was going to ask him, because for centuries in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence due process of law meant the mechanics of a trial, a fair trial, the right to produce witnesses, and to have them sworn and give testimony under oath. It had to do with adjective law and not substantive law. It was our Supreme Court that translated that ancient expression, which is familiar to every student of American and English jurisprudence, into substantive law.

But the Senator, in speaking of what the Supreme Court did in examining the records in connection with the congressional proceedings incident to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, presents a rather striking parallel opposite to the picture drawn a few moments ago by the Senator from Alabama. He said that the debates in Congress reflected clearly the purpose of Congress not to adopt the doctrine of the rule of reason in the antitrust case, but the Supreme Court completely overrode that and said that the Congress did not mean what it was trying to do there.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has a great desire which I have not this afternoon—I may have it later—to discuss the Supreme Court question. I am undertaking now simply to illustrate what seems to me to be the duty of the Congress of the United States, and that is to submit to the people the proposition of turning back to the States the complete power to govern their internal and local affairs.

Mr. BONE. I agree with the Senator's proposed amendment; I think it is perfectly all right, for reasons which I have suggested on the floor; but the very purpose of the Senator's proposed amendment is to prevent what the Court has apparently done by its interpretation of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. In candor and honor, I do not see how the Court could help do other than it has done when the wording of the fourteenth amendment is considered. That amendment provides:

> Nor shall any State deprive—
> Deprive—
> any person of life, liberty, or property.

That is a broad statement. If a man is deprived of liberty by legislation or is deprived of his property by legislation, it would be rather difficult for a judge to hold that the fourteenth amendment was being upheld when such action was taken. But I feel that in matters of legislation the action of the States should not be open to review by the Federal courts.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. But the Court did hold that exact thing for a long number of years, did it not?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. BLACK. Did they not at first limit it, and did they not later expand it to the doctrine which the Senator has just mentioned?

Mr. BORAH. I said a few moments ago that for the first 20 years the Court did not extend the fourteenth amendment to substantive legislation, but there was no substantive legislation before the Court until some time, I think, in 1880.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the Senator recall the case, if I am not mistaken as to it, involving rates where the Court with reference to elevator rates in the West——

Mr. BORAH. That is what I am referring to.

Mr. BLACK. Specifically and pointedly held that the fourteenth amendment did not apply; that it was a legislative matter to which the amendment did not refer? Mr. Justice Field dissented. A majority, however, decided that the legislature did have the right to fix rates. Then, later on, after the Court changed, the majority decided that the legislature did not have the right to fix rates without court supervision.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator may be correct, but my memory is different. My memory is that it was the first rate case which came before the Court. As I recall, the first case which came before the Supreme Court was known as the Slaughterhouse case. That case was decided on another clause of the fourteenth amendment. The due-process clause was not invoked at all. Justice Bradley in a paragraph of less than an inch said that it might be that the due-process clause would cover substantive legislation, but that is the only reference made to it.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Did not Justice Field in that case, in his dissent, advance the thesis which eventually became the opinion of the Court, that due process did not mean simply a fair trial, and did not that finally become, and is it not today, the opinion of the Supreme Court; namely, the thesis of Justice Field first advanced in his dissent in the Slaughterhouse case?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I am speaking from memory, but as I speak from memory of the Slaughterhouse case, the majority opinion made no reference to the due-process clause. Justice Miller said that in his opinion the fourteenth amendment would never be extended to include anything beyond protecting the rights of the colored people, that it was designed for that purpose, and he doubted if it would ever be applied otherwise. From that statement Justice Field dissented. He held that the fourteenth amendment covered all persons, and so forth; but, as I recall, Justice Field himself did not refer to the due-process clause.

Justice Bradley did say, in the way of argument in reaching his conclusion, that it might be—I am not quoting his exact language—that the due-process clause would cover substantive legislation. That never was adopted as the majority view of the Court until 1887, when certain rate cases came before the Court.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is of the opinion that some rate case was decided one way and another rate case another way. My recollection is it was in the first rate case that came before the Court that they finally held it was taking property without due process of law when rates were fixed which did not insure any income whatever.

Mr. President, all I desire to say in regard to the matter is that it can be corrected and ought to be corrected. It ought not to be left for a Court of 9 men or a Court of 15 men to deal with it. It ought not to be left there for a matter of controversy at all. I say there is no one more competent to pass upon these things than the State itself, and if we do not believe in that principle we do not believe in self-government.

The people who choose us and send us here are the same people who choose their legislatures. They are liable to make the same mistake with reference to us that they make with respect to their legislatures, and they are liable to get just as competent men in their legislatures and as their Governors as those whom they send here; but they get men in their legislatures and for their Governors who know things we cannot possibly know about the States unless we are residents of them.

For instance, why should a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States with reference to a minimum wage in New York, taking into consideration all the local business conditions, social conditions, and so forth, prevail as a test of what is a reasonable wage in the State of Idaho where the situation is wholly different?

If we are going to maintain this great Government of ours we have got to have something in the nature of local self-government, and God in his wisdom has forbidden unity or standardization of the people of the United States. We are different in the different parts of our country, and thank heaven we are!

Mr. President, something has been said about the opinion of the Supreme Court with reference to the Antitrust case. I agree with the view which has been expressed that the Supreme Court applied a construction upon the Antitrust Act which, in my opinion, was not warranted. I am of the opinion that Congress intended to prohibit all trusts and combinations in restraint of trade, and that Congress intended to prohibit monopoly. That was the view which was taken by the Supreme Court for some time.

The Court finally held that it was only an inhibition of unreasonable restraint of trade. In other words, the Court went back to the common law and deduced from the common law a rule of action which permitted them to hold that only unreasonable restraint of trade was included. I myself do not agree with that construction and never have. But, Mr. President, there are plenty of trusts and combines oppressing the people of the United States which are unreasonable and unconscionable. In addition, we can by legislation make the law apply to all trusts or monopolies. I have a bill pending which in my opinion will destroy monopolies and trusts.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HERRING in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. In the very case in which the Supreme Court wrote this into the antitrust law, it was admitted by everybody that the trust then before the Court was unreasonable.

Mr. BORAH. But the Court dissolved the corporation notwithstanding its argument about unreasonableness. I do not care how they got there, just so they reached the corporation. They did dissolve the corporation in that case and effectuated what we all desired.

I myself disagree with my able friend from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] when he says we cannot destroy monopoly in the United States, that we cannot prohibit monopoly in the United States, successfully and effectually. We do not dare to take that position; that is, to say that there is in the United States and under the American flag a power superior to the Government of the United States. We are not going to make any such admission. It is within our power. All it requires is that the will and purpose of the American people be effectuated by their leaders here in Congress. After you have done all that the Senator from Alabama wants to do, shortening hours and fixing minimum wages, the workingman is but little better off if some private interest fixes the price for everything he eats or wears. Until you destroy that price-fixing process by private corporations there is no hope for the common people.

THE DISASTER AT NEW LONDON, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I send to the desk the last report from the War Department with reference to yesterday's tragedy in Texas.

Let me say that upon hearing of the disaster the Chief of Staff, Maj. Gen. Malin Craig, ordered Maj. Gen. Herbert J. Brees, commanding officer of the Eighth Corps Area at San Antonio, Tex., to the scene of the calamity. General Brees arrived there late last night by plane and rendered the quickest possible aid by securing cots, bedding, mattresses, medicine, personnel, and so forth, from the nearest C. C. C. companies. The Army rendered prompt and able assistance.

I ask that the memorandum which I send to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TYLER, TEX., March 19, 1937.

To The ADJUTANT GENERAL, War Department.
(Attention: Chief of Staff.)

Have just returned from personal investigation disaster New London. National Guard of Texas in charge. Town under martial law. About 400 deaths out of seven hundred-odd school children. Salvation Army and Red Cross on job. Cots, mattresses, bedding, medicine, and personnel furnished last night from C. C. C. companies in the vicinity. In my opinion no further assistance from Army needed, but we are standing by in case necessity arises.

BREES.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SIT-DOWN STRIKES

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I rise because I am unwilling to have go unchallenged the effort which was made here today to attribute responsibility for the sit-down strike to the Supreme Court of the United States. If Senators wish to unite the two, they are welcome to do so; but there is nothing in the situation on either side that can justify the assertion that anything which is being done in Michigan or elswhere in this country by sit-down strikers is related in the remotest degree either to the legislation here or to the opinions of the Supreme Court.

The sit-down strike is not a strike for wages. It is not a strike for hours. It is not a strike for better living conditions. It is not a strike for legislation. It is not a strike for Supreme Court decisions, nor is it a strike for the reconstruction of the Supreme Court. The sit-down strike is a strike for power. It is induced by a minority labor group for the purpose of gathering to itself exclusive control of the workers and the institutions throughout the industries which are affected by the strike. This group demands exclusive power to represent all workers.

How can that obvious fact be related to opinions of the Supreme Court or legislation in the Congress? I think in the debate here today it has been made perfectly clear that the opinions of the Court complained of were based upon a reasonable construction of the fourteenth amendment, and in the New York case—the minimum-wage case—upon a reasonable construction not only of the fourteenth amendment but of the opinion of the highest court of the State of New York. No one blames the Court of Appeals of New York for the decision in the minimum-wage case. Why should anyone be blaming the Supreme Court of the United States for the same decision?

I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is eminently just and eminently correct in saying that but for the fourteenth amendment it would be the clear duty of the Supreme Court of the United States to follow the decisions of the highest courts of the several States in matters relating solely to the States. Nevertheless the New York case is brought forward here today, and the case in Kansas in 1904, and one in Oregon, I think, in 1914; I hope not by way of justifying but by way in some fashion of attributing to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the lawless conduct of an ambitious labor leader who has encouraged workers throughout America to violate the law, which everybody knows is the law, and take possession of property, and then invite force to be met with force and horrify the country.

I am not saying there should be force. I would give the counsel of patience, too; but I am unwilling for anybody in this country to say that what those men are doing under that leadership can be laid at the door of the Congress, or of the legislature of any State, or of the supreme court of any State, or of the Supreme Court of the United States. I lay it at the door of an ambitious labor leader who is determined, in competition with other labor organizations, to obtain exclusive control of labor in the United States, and thereby, I think, to obtain control of industry.

That is a struggle for power, not a struggle for wages; and it is a struggle for power by a minority. Fourteen percent of the workers in the General Motors plants undertook to grasp a monopoly of the rights of all the workers in those plants.

I do not know what the percentage is in the Chrysler establishments. Perhaps it is a little greater, perhaps a little less; but I do not think I should be quiet here when a Senator puts forward an argument which tends to give standing to that sort of thing on the ground that a Congress has been delinquent, or a Supreme Court has been obstinate. There is nothing in such a contention.

We might as well face the facts in America. If there is trouble here, if there is profound unrest here, if there is danger here, it is not to be attributed to the present controversy concerning the Supreme Court. It is not to be attributed either to the success or to the failure of the Wagner Labor Relations Act. The strikers have not invoked it. They have ignored it. It is not to be attributed to any decision or any series of decisions of any courts. It ought not to be involved in this great controversy; but if Senators wish to involve it, I am willing to go to the country on that issue. If they wish to induce sit-down strikes by that sort of agitation; if it is sought to encourage the hope that by labor agitations, or other sorts of threatened "crises", we can be forced to add six Justices to the Supreme Court for the purpose of interpreting the Constitution to suit the needs of fancied friends of labor—if they wish to take that view of the matter and go to the country on that issue, I am willing to go with them; but I protest that there is no foundation for it.

I come back to my point. I rose for the purpose of saying that this strike which so distresses us all, which all of us must deplore, is a strike for power. Congress has nothing on earth to do with the ambitions of anybody for power. No court has anything to do with the ambitions of any labor organization for power. There is nothing we can do to give them power, and if we could give them power we ought not to do it. Let us recognize that, and let us keep this controversy clear of that, if we may.

I should like to say one other word. I know the desire is to adjourn. I gather from the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] that he is looking for some sort of legislation in the nature of a provision for compulsory arbitration to meet the situation. He lamented that the compulsory arbitration law of Kansas was held to be unconstitutional, and at the same time he proclaimed his everlasting fidelity to the Bill of Rights.

If I recall the case to which the Senator referred, it went off precisely on the ground that we could not compel men to arbitrate, that we could not determine contracts for them, could not put them under compulsion with respect to their right to work or their right not to work. I thought that was well established.

Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator is not present. I wish to say that if that is the sort of legislation he has in mind and proposes, in event the present members of the Supreme Court can be driven from the bench, allegedly because they are old, actually because they have held some acts unconstitutional, or, failing to drive them off, appoint associates for them—all with a view to validating legislation so far undisclosed, unless the Senator today disclosed it—legislation, if he properly disclosed it, which will bring about compulsory arbitration between capital and labor in the United States—I hope he will notify the C. I. O. and the sit-down strikers. Then we will get their reaction.

The other word I desire to say is that there has been a good deal said here this afternoon about a "no man's land." There is a "no man's land" in the United States and there always will be. There ought to be a "no man's land" in the United States and there always will be one. It is the "land" of the rights reserved to the individuals—to the people. That does not belong to Congress, it does not belong to the President, it does not belong to the courts, and does not belong to the States. When this Government was created there were the rights vested in the Federal Government, the rights reserved to the States, and the rights reserved to human beings, the people. That is the "no man's land." It is every man's land, the realm of every man's inalienable rights.

It may be that "no man's land" does present difficulties. I think it does. But let those in the United States, those in the seats of power, those in the Senate and the House, who propose to invade that "no man's land", come forth with their legislation and let us see it. Let the American people see it. Let us know what they are going to do before they impose upon us a Court which will justify that invasion.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BAILEY. I was yielding the floor, but I will answer the Senator's question if I can.

Mr. MINTON. I understood the Senator to say that, on the theory on which the Kansas labor case was decided, labor could not be forced to carry out its contracts.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I said that we could not force a man to arbitrate in a strike. Oh, no; I did not say we could not force a man to carry out his contract. I have always understood we can have specific performance or damages, one or the other; but I know we cannot have that with respect to labor unions.

Mr. MINTON. Does the Senator mean to say that specific performance of a contract for labor can be enforced.

Mr. BAILEY. No; but I think I can assert that there can be an injunction to prevent a man, in the case of a contract for special services, from working for other people, without damages. That is as far as the law goes in that matter.

Mr. MINTON. The Supreme Court, in one case at least, held that a man could be forced to carry out his contract of labor. In Robertson v. Baldwin (165 U. S. 275), the Court, notwithstanding the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, sustained an act of Congress which provided that if a man signed up to go on a voyage with the master of a ship, and decided he did not want to carry out his contract, and left the ship, any justice of the peace could arrest him, hold him in irons, and turn him over to the master, and the master could make him carry out his contract.

Mr. BAILEY. I am much obliged to the Senator. I freely confess I am not familiar with the case. I should be glad if he would give me a reference to the case and let me read it, and then I will discuss it with him. In the meantime, I will say that it has nothing whatever to do with my statement that the Congress has no power under the Bill of Rights to enact a compulsory arbitration law.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5232) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Bureau of Navigation—Training, education, and welfare, Navy", on page 8, line 14, after the word "for", to strike out "$194,210" and insert "$197,310", so as to read:

Instruction: For postgraduate instruction of officers in other than civil government and literature, including such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act approved January 16, 1936 (Public Act No. 417, 74th Cong.), and for special instruction, education, and individual training of officers and enlisted men at home and abroad, including maintenance of students abroad, except aviation training and submarine training otherwise appropriated for, $197,310.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Reserve", on page 14, line 4, after the word "aircraft", to strike out "$9,269,909" and insert "$9,322,109"; so as to read:

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia, including the designing, purchasing, and engraving of trophies; pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when employed on authorized training duty; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from training duty; transportation of enlisted men to and from training duty, and subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enlisted men during the actual period of training duty; subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve while performing authorized training or other duty without pay; pay, mileage, and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve, and pay, allowances, subsistence, and transportation with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof, of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty in connection with the instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve; pay and allowances, including travel and other allowances as authorized by law (excluding clothing and small-stores issues and uniform gratuities), of aviation cadets of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty, including active duty undergoing training; pay of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of not to exceed 48 drills per annum or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency, as the Secretary of the Navy may designate, physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft, $9,322,109, of which amount not more than $150,000 shall be available for maintenance and rental of armories, including pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage; not more than $81,000 shall be available for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department; not less than $3,359,469 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for aviation material, equipment, fuel, and rental of hangars, and not more than $397,914 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and the transportation thereof, and for all other expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve, and of such total sum $6,568,489 shall be available exclusively for and on account of Naval and Marine Corps Reserve aviation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Academy", on page 16, line 3, after the word "employees", to strike out "$607,121" and insert "$609,821", so as to read:

For pay of other employees, $609,821, of which $2,474 shall be available exclusively on account of the collection of ship models bequeathed by the late Henry H. Rogers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 25, after the word "instruments", to strike out "$1,058,000" and insert "$1,070,000", so as to read:

Maintenance and repairs, Naval Academy: For necessary repairs of public buildings, wharves, and walls enclosing the grounds of the Naval Academy, accident prevention, improvements, repairs, and fixtures; for books, periodicals, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants, machinery; purchase and maintenance of all horses and horse-drawn vehicles for use at the academy, including the maintenance, operation, and repair of three horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes; seeds and plants; tools and repairs of the same; stationery; furniture for Government buildings and offices at the academy, including furniture for midshipmen's rooms; coal and other fuels; candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up station and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, fire apparatus, and plants, and telephone, telegraph, and clock systems; incidental labor, advertising, water tax, postage, telephones, telegrams, tolls, and ferriage; flags and awnings; packing boxes; pay of inspectors and draftsmen; and music and astronomical instruments, $1,070,000, of which $2,000 shall be available exclusively on account of the collection of ship models bequeathed by the late Henry H. Rogers:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Engineering—Engineering", on page 20, line 21, after the words "in all", to strike out "$21,838,700" and insert "$22,080,800", so as to read:

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order, and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service; equipage, supplies, and materials under the cognizance of the Bureau required for the maintenance and operation of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats; purchase, installation, repair, and preservation of machinery, tools, and appliances in navy yards and stations, accident prevention, pay of classified field force under the Bureau; incidental expenses for naval vessels, navy yards, and stations, inspectors' offices, the engineering experiment station, such as photographing, technical books and periodicals, stationery, and instruments; services, instruments, machines and auxiliaries, apparatus and supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work; maintenance and equipment of buildings and grounds at the engineering experiment station, Annapolis, Md.; payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any persons so employed; in all, $22,080,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Construction and Repair", on page 22, line 4, after the word "materials", to strike out "$19,283,500" and insert "$19,458,500", so as to read:

For designing naval vessels, including services, instruments, apparatus, and materials necessary for experimental and research work; payment of part time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; maintenance, repairs, and alterations of vessels; care and preservation of vessels out of commission; docking of vessels; salvage and salvage services for naval floating property; construction and repair of district and yard craft; purchase and manufacture of equipage, appliances, supplies, and materials at home and abroad as required for the maintenance, repair, alteration, and operation of naval vessels and district and yard craft; carrying on work of the experimental model basin and wind tunnel; tools and appliances for all purposes in navy yards and naval stations; labor in navy yards and naval stations and elsewhere at home and abroad; accident prevention; pay of classified field force, including employees in material inspection and superintending constructors' offices; incidental expenses at navy yards and naval stations and in material inspection and superintending constructors' offices such as photographing, technical and professional books and magazines, plans, stationery, drafting instruments and other materials, $19,458,500:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Ordnance—Ordnance and ordnance stores, Bureau of Ordnance", on page 23, line 19, after the name "West Virginia", to strike out "$24,404,800" and insert "$24,454,800", so as to read:

For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material for the armament of ships; for the purchase and manufacture of torpedoes and appliances; for the purchase and manufacture of smokeless powder; for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work under the cognizance of the Bureau of Ordnance; for furniture at naval ammunition depots, torpedo stations, naval ordnance plants, and proving grounds; for technical books; plant appliances as now defined by the Navy Classification of Accounts; for machinery and machine tools; for accident prevention; for experimental work in connection with the development of ordnance material for the Navy; for maintenance of proving grounds, powder factory, torpedo stations, gun factory, ammunition depots, and naval ordnance plants, and for target practice; not to exceed $15,000 for minor improvements to buildings, grounds, and appurtenances of a character which can be performed by regular station labor; for payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy in his discretion at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; for the maintenance, repair, and operation of horse-drawn and motor-propelled freight and passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes at naval ammunition depots, naval proving grounds, naval ordnance plants, and naval torpedo stations; for the pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots, and for care and operation of schools at ordnance stations at Indianhead, Md.; Dahlgren, Va.; and South Charleston, W. Va., $24,454,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts—Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel", on page 24, line 7, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$1,695,100" and insert "$1,699,540"; and in line 10, after the word "captain", to strike out "except not more than two officers of the rank of rear admiral" and insert "except not more than one officer of the rank of vice admiral and three officers of the rank of rear admiral", so as to read:

Pay of naval personnel: For pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders—pay, $34,762,731, including not to exceed $1,699,540 for increased pay for making aerial flights, no part of which shall be available for increased pay for making aerial flights by any officer above the rank of captain, except not more than one officer of the rank of vice admiral and three officers of the rank of rear admiral, nor by nonflying officers or observers at a rate in excess of $1,440 per annum, which shall be the legal maximum rate as to such nonflying officers or observers; rental allowance, $7,275,000; subsistence allowance, $4,358,427; in all, $46,396,158.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 6, to strike out:

NAVAL SUPPLY ACCOUNT FUND

For transfer to the credit of the Naval supply account fund, $5,000,000, and not more than $5,000,000 of the naval supply account fund shall be available for the purchase of a reserve supply of prepared and processed strategic minerals of domestic production.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Yards and Docks—Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks", on page 37, line 24, after the word "employed", to strike out "$7,872,958" and insert "$7,875,958", so as to read:

For the labor, materials, and supplies necessary, as determined by the Secretary of the Navy, for the general maintenance of the activities and properties now or hereafter under the cognizance of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, including accident prevention; the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles for the Navy Department (not to exceed 10 in number) and the Naval Establishment not otherwise provided for; not to exceed $1,525,000 for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department, and part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, of such engineers and architects as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $25 per diem for any person so employed, $7,875,958.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 3, after the words "Ten at", to strike out "$1,300" and insert "$1,600", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That during the fiscal year 1938 the motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be purchased hereunder shall not exceed the following respective numbers and costs: Ten at $1,600 each, 36 at $550 each, and 3 motorbusses at $4,200 each, and motortruck chassis with station wagon type bodies as required.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Works, Bureau of Yards and Docks", on page 39, line 3, after the word "Docks", to strike out "$5,827,000" and insert "$6,552,000", so as to read:

For public works and public utilities, Bureau of Yards and Docks, $6,552,000, which, together with the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made under this head, shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 20, to strike out:

Model testing plant: Toward the model testing plant, authorized by the act approved May 6, 1936 (49 Stat., pp. 1263, 1264), including buildings and facilities, $2,500,000: Provided, That no part of such sum shall be available for the acquisition of land or for the provision, by contract or otherwise, of any buildings or facilities for testing other than surface and subsurface craft.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Model testing plant, vicinity of Washington, D. C.: Model testing plant, including buildings and facilities and purchase of land, $3,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 5, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading, "Bureau of Aeronautics—Aviation, Navy", on page 43, line 24, after the word "airplane", to strike out the comma and "or for the construction or manufacture in a Government-owned factory or plant of airplane engines, other than experimental engines, or airplanes, other than airplanes for primary training purposes, except airplane engines and airplanes building or which had been formally ordered on or prior to March 2, 1937", so as to read:

For aviation, as follows: For navigational, photographic, aerological, radio, and miscellaneous equipment, including repairs thereto, for use with aircraft built or building on June 30, 1937, $750,000; for maintenance, repair, and operation of aircraft factory, air stations, fleet air bases, fleet and all other aviation activities, accident prevention, testing laboratories, for overhauling of planes, and for the purchase for aviation purposes only of special clothing, wearing apparel, and special equipment, $18,064,000, including $250,000 for the equipment of vessels with catapults and including not to exceed $50,000 for the procurement of helium, which sum of $50,000 shall be transferred to and made available to the Bureau of Mines on July 1, 1937, in addition to which sum the Bureau of Mines may use for helium-plant operation in the fiscal year 1938 the unexpended balance of funds transferred to it for such operation in the fiscal year 1937, and the Bureau may lease, after competition, surplus metal cylinders acquired for use as helium containers; for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft, including the payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed, $3,500,000; for new construction and procurement of aircraft and equipment, spare parts and accessories, $27,186,000, of which amount not to exceed $13,000,000 shall be available for the payment of obligations incurred under the contract authorization carried in the Navy Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1937; in all, $49,500,000, and the money herein specifically appropriated for "Aviation" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $1,582,340: Provided further, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated, the Secretary of the Navy may, prior to July 1, 1938, enter into contracts for the production and purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts and accessories, to an amount not in excess of $15,000,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, to transfer not to exceed in the aggregate $50,000 from this appropriation to the appropriations "Pay, subsistence, and transportation, Navy" and "Pay, Marine Corps" to cover authorized traveling expenses of officers and enlisted men in connection with flying new airplanes from contractor's works to assigned station or ship, including travel to contractor's works and return of personnel to stations of duty, and the amount so transferred shall be in addition to any limitations contained in the appropriations "Pay, subsistence, and transportation, Navy" and "Pay, Marine Corps": Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance of more than six heavier-than-air stations on the coast of the continental United States: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the construction of a factory for the manufacture of airplanes:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Marine Corps—General expenses, Marine Corps", on page 48, line 3, to strike out "$595,000" and insert "$610,000", so as to read:

For military supplies and equipment, including their purchase, repair, preservation, and handling; recreational, school, educational, library, musical, amusement, field sport and gymnasium supplies, equipment, services, and incidental expenses; purchase and marking of prizes for excellence in gunnery and rifle practice, good-conduct badges, medals, and buttons awarded to officers and enlisted men by the Government for conspicuous, gallant, and special service; rental and maintenance of target ranges and entrance fees for competitions, $610,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 14, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$2,330,000" and insert "$2,332,600", so as to read:

For miscellaneous supplies, material, equipment, personal and other services, and for other incidental expenses for the Marine Corps not otherwise provided for; purchase, repair, and exchange of typewriters and calculating machines; purchase and repair of furniture and fixtures; repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; and purchase, exchange, and repair of horse-drawn passenger-carrying and other vehicles, including parts; veterinary services and medicines for public animals and the authorized number of officers' horses; purchase of mounts and horse equipment for all officers below the grade of major required to be mounted; shoeing for public animals and the authorized number of officers' horses; books, newspapers, and periodicals; printing and binding; packing and crating of officers' allowance of baggage; funeral expenses of officers and enlisted men and accepted applicants for enlistment and retired officers on active duty, including the transportation of their bodies, arms, and wearing apparel from the place of demise to the homes of the deceased in the United States; construction, operation, and maintenance of laundries; and for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, $2,332,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 20, after the words "Two at", to strike out "$1,300" and insert "$1,600", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That there may be expended out of this appropriation (including the exchange value of any vehicle that may be used as part payment) for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, the gross cost of any one vehicle not to be in excess of the respective amounts as follows: Two at $1,600 each; 2 at $900 each; 8 at $700 each; 10 station wagons at $700 each; and 5 motorcycles at $300 each;

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 1, after the words "In all", to strike out "$7,978,153" and insert "$7,995,753", so as to read:

In all, $7,995,753, to be accounted for as one fund: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Replacement of naval vessels", on page 50, line 13, before the word "destroyers", to strike out the colon and "Eight" and insert a comma and "eight", so as to read:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized (and appropriated for in part), and for the commencement of the following vessels authorized by the act approved March 27, 1934 (48 Stat. 503–505) eight destroyers and four submarines, $90,000,000, to remain available until expended:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Navy Department—Salaries", on page 54, line 15, to change the appropriation for compensation for personal services in the District of Columbia, Office of the Secretary of the Navy, from $186,070 to $189,130.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 21, to change the appropriation for compensation for personal services in the District of Columbia, Office of the Chief of Naval Operations, from $67,640 to $69,260.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 13, to change the total appropriation for salaries, Navy Department, from $4,045,019 to $4,049,699.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses", on page 57, line 10, after the word "offices", to strike out "$105,000" and insert "$110,000", so as to read:

For professional and technical books and periodicals, law books, and necessary reference books, including city directories, railway guides, freight, passenger, and express tariff books and photostating, for department library; for purchase of photographs, maps, documents, and pictorial records of the Navy, photostating and other necessary incidental expenses in connection with the preparation for publication of the naval records of the war with the Central Powers of Europe; for stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, and drawing materials; purchase and exchange of motor trucks or motor-delivery wagons, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks or motor-delivery wagons; garage rent; streetcar fares; freight, expressage, postage, typewriters, and computing machines, and other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department and its various bureaus and offices, $110,000; it shall not be lawful to expend, unless otherwise specifically provided herein, for any of the offices or bureaus of the Navy Department in the District of Columbia, any sum out of appropriations made for the naval service for any of the purposes mentioned or authorized in this paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "$1,624,169" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,627,269", so as to read:

In all, training, education, and welfare, Navy, $1,627,269.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, this amendment is simply to correct the total.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire if the committee amendments have been completed.

Mr. BYRNES. The committee amendments have been completed.

Mr. President, I recall to the Senate that before the very lengthy discussion on the naval appropriation bill which has taken place today [laughter], the statement was made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] that he hoped the consideration of the measure would not be completed at today's session. I am entirely satisfied at this hour that consideration of the measure be not completed; and in the absence from the floor of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HUGHES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Guy K. Bard, of Pennsylvania, to be United States attorney, eastern district of Pennsylvania, vice Charles D. McAvoy, deceased.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of several officers for promotion in the Regular Army.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the following nominations:

Capt. Andrew C. Pickens to be Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of rear admiral, for a term of 4 years from the 17th day of June 1937; and Naval Constructor William G. Du Bose to be Chief Constructor and Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of rear admiral, for a term of 4 years from the 16th day of March 1937.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Walter F. Boyle, of Georgia, to be Consul General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Francis H. Styles, of Virginia, to be Secretary in the Diplomatic Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William H. Hastie, of Washington, D. C., to be judge for the District Court of the Virgin Islands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceed to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations for promotions in the Navy be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations in the Navy are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS TO MONDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, March 22, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 19, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the merciful Father of humanity, allow not the clouds and darkness to be roundabout Thy throne. O Thou who didst climb the scarred and bleeding summit of Calvary, for Thy mercy's sake, hear our prayer. We pause at the riverside; our harps are on the willow; we falter on the world's great altar stairs that slope through darkness up to God. Thou who canst fill with comfort broken hearts, broken loves, and broken lives, be Thou the angel of consolation in that sorely stricken district in our Southland. In their deepest sorrow and saddest bereavement unveil Thy face in every home where tragedy is so deep and overwhelming. O speak, Mighty Life, and let in the morning of hope and peace. Thou blessed Christ, whose love for little children was so divine that it would not let them go, take them and keep them in the white light of the Father's throne. Their shadow was love, their language was music, and their steps were a benediction. O Savior of the ages, hear our prayer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday's RECORD shows that I was present at the session. However, when the roll was called on the Neutrality Act of 1937, Senate Joint Resolution 51, I was unavoidably absent from the Hall of the House on official business. Had I been present I would have voted "no" on roll call 33 on the motion to recommit and "yea" on roll call no. 34, on the final passage of the bill.

STATE AND FEDERAL TAXES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, two things of importance have happened this week. One is that millions of people have made their peace with the income-tax collector, and the other is a rather pointed statement made by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board relative to balancing the Budget, and implying the necessity for further taxes. That, of course, raises a very interesting question about the conflict of taxation between the States and Federal Government, and on that question I should like to make some observations.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is speaking about the statement of Mr Eccles?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman expect to put the whole statement in the RECORD?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; I do not. I think it has already appeared.

Mr. RANKIN. No; it has not. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] objected to my putting it into the RECORD, so I should like to have the gentleman from Illinois do so.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I had no intention of putting it into the RECORD.

Mr. RANKIN. It was a very important statement.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it is.

Mr. RANKIN. And bears on one of the most important questions this Congress will have to deal with. I should like to have the gentleman put the whole statement into the RECORD; it is not very long.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Monday of this week was March 15. That day is always front-page news. It is the day on which our citizens must have made their peace with the Bureau of Internal Revenue. It is the dead-line day for income-tax returns. For a brief while several million families are tax conscious as they render an account to the Federal Government. Thereafter the subject of Federal taxation is gently placed in moth balls and put away until the following March. Sooner or later, however, will come the time when the matter will not be so blithely dismissed, because there already looms before us what might be styled the irrepressible conflict between State and Federal taxes. It has already received the attention of the State taxing bodies and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. Before long it must receive definite action.

The Federal Budget calls for expenditures of slightly over $6,000,000,000. This does not include relief and deficiency appropriations, nor does it include appropriations for the new legislation proposed. Already a deficiency bill running into hundreds of millions has been enacted. Pending before committees of Congress are bills dealing with housing, crop insurance, farm tenancy, expansion of the Works Progress Administration, and a host of other items. Under these impacts for more funds it is safe to say that we are on the way toward an $8,000,000,000 expenditure.

Revenues with which to meet expenditures for this fiscal year are estimated at slightly over seven and a quarter billions. There will doubtless be a deficit. Income will not cover outgo. Hence, there will be new borrowings. The Government's credit is good. All it need do to meet the deficit is to issue short- or long-term notes, bills, and bonds and sell them to the public. But these borrowings only serve to increase the national debt and continue an unbalanced budget. Borrowings serve to swell bank deposits, and increased bank deposits only add to the worries of the Federal Reserve Board, who want no unhealthy and artificial inflationary boom. Hence, every discerning person, knowing the potential danger in a continuing unbalanced budget, would like to have it balanced.

On that point, the statement of Marriner Eccles, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, made on March 15 is significant:

> Under present conditions of an accelerating recovery, a continued easy money policy to be successful in achieving and maintaining a balanced recovery must be accompanied by a prompt balancing of the Federal Budget and the subsequent retirement of public debt in relationship to the expansion of private credit * * *.

How shall it be done? We might print a supply of new money, provided we have no concern about the evil consequences to follow. We might economize. The word seems like a stranger and is seemingly out of date. There appears no thought of doing so at least. But if we do not print money, and if we do not economize, and if we want the Budget balanced, there is but one other way to effect it and that is more taxes.

Singular enough, States are experiencing the same difficulty. They, too, have been expanding governmental functions. They, too, have been subject to increasing demands on the State treasuries, and they, too, in order to keep their budgets balanced are constantly on the alert for new taxes. The unhappy taxpayer today is therefore in the position of free game, being stalked by a Federal tax collector and a State tax collector to see which of the two shall be first in getting the elusive dollars of the taxpayer. It is not a happy prospect, either for the taxpayer, for the State, or for the Federal Government.

This race between the Federal and State sovereignties for new taxes and larger taxes finally results in double taxes, in overlapping taxes, in expensive administration of taxing acts for the purpose of getting at the same source of revenue and in a host of other conflicts, all of which are aggravating a problem that must one day engage the best thought of those who sense the inequities in such a procedure. A few illustrations will make this abundantly clear.

Sales taxes: Today 25 States have a sales tax ranging in amount from one-fourth percent to 3 percent. It covers virtually everything that is offered at retail from cradles to caskets. For the fiscal year 1934, these 25 States collected more than $201,000,000 from this source of funds. Now, look at the manufacturers excise tax imposed by the Federal Government. This term is but an impressive variation of the term "sales tax", except in that it is collected at the factory instead of over the counter. It covers lubricating oils, gasoline, brewers wort, matches, tires, tubes, toilet preparations, furs, jewelry, radios, cameras, firearms, shells, cartridges, gum, phonograph records, motorcars, and some other items. From these the Federal Government expects to collect more than four hundred and forty-eight millions for the next fiscal year. How does it work from the standpoint of a taxpayer? Simple enough. If he buys a radio, he pays a sales tax to the State in which he makes the purchase, and in the price he pays is hidden the tax which the Federal Government collected at the place where the radio was manufactured.

Gasoline taxes: Forty-eight States now have gasoline taxes ranging from 2 cents a gallon in Rhode Island to 7 cents a gallon in Tennessee and Florida. In 1934, the various States collected more than five hundred and sixty-one millions in gasoline taxes. But while the States were collecting more than half a billion a year from the motorists, the Federal Government found it to be an easy source of revenue also, and so it now collects more than two hundred and four millions on gasoline from the same motorists.

Motor-vehicle taxes: The 25,000,000 owners and operators of trucks, busses, and passenger cars in the 48 States pay an annual average of $12.35 in motor-vehicle taxes. That runs into millions. In addition, many cities collect so-called "wheel taxes" on the same vehicles. Then comes the Federal Government to collect more than fifty-eight millions annually in the form of manufacturers' excise or sales taxes, which is reflected in the price the motorist pays for his new car.

Income taxes: For the fiscal year 1938, the Federal Government expects to collect 3,134 million in income taxes, from millions of people. That is but half the story. Thirty-one States have taxes on personal incomes, 31 States have taxes on corporate incomes, and 29 States have taxes on both. In 1934, these State income taxes produced more than one hundred and thirty-seven millions in revenue. And what diverse income taxes they are! Individual exemptions range from $600 in West Virginia to $1,500 in Alabama. Exemptions for married persons range from $1,200 in Utah to $3,500 in Georgia. Income-tax rates in the various States range from a minimum of 1 percent to a high of 15 percent in North Dakota. And what tax oddities these diverse laws provoke! A man and wife with three children having an income of $5,000 would pay a tax of $132 in Iowa but would pay no State tax if living in Illinois. The same family with an income of $100,000 annually would, in addition to the Federal tax, pay a State tax of $4,882 in Iowa, $5,583 in New York, $13,500 in North Dakota, and $20,104 in Montana.

Liquor taxes: For the next fiscal year, the Federal Government expects to collect more than $643,000,000 in excise taxes on imported and domestic liquors, beer, wine, on rectifiers, on dealers, on stamps, and other things incident to the business of making and selling beer, wine, and alcoholic beverages. Forty-four States also have an assortment of liquor taxes which in 1934 yielded the tidy sum of $80,000,000. In addition, cities and counties now collect a variety of license fees.

Tobacco taxes: Since the Civil War, the Federal Government has been collecting taxes on tobacco. These taxes now include cigarettes, cigars, tobacco, and snuff. For the fiscal year these are expected to net a sum in excess of 543 millions. Now come the States to collect on cigarettes. Nineteen of them collected almost $24,000,000 from cigarettes in 1934. Here also one can discern real latitude. In Georgia the tax equals 10 percent of the sales price, in Arkansas it amounts to 40 percent of the sales price. But no matter what the range or variety, the smoker pays the bill.

Admissions: Long ago we came to regard taxes on admissions to theaters, concerts, and cabarets as a war hangover. But the war became history and the admission taxes, like Tennyson's brook, went on forever. It is perhaps a minor item, yet it will yield the Federal Treasury an estimated twenty million or more for the next fiscal year. It is such a pleasant kind of tax, apparently, for 34 States felt that it was a legitimate source of revenue, and in 1934 collected six and one-quarter millions from this source.

Inheritance or estate taxes: Combined Federal and State tax rates on estates of decedents are now three times as high as they were in 1926. Forty-seven States now have death taxes. The Federal rate ranges from 1 percent to 60 percent on the net taxable estate. Credit is allowed up to 80 percent for death taxes paid to the States. The State rates are so varied as to defy classification. In 1934 Federal collections on estates amounted to approximately one hundred and four millions and State collections to ninety-two millions.

There are other instances of overlapping taxation, but these will suffice to prove the point.

This whole matter of conflicting, duplicating, and overlapping State and Federal taxation raises some very interesting questions.

There is, for instance, the efforts of some States to lure industries and people of wealth to become residents within their confines on the promise of easy taxation.

Consider the item of administrative costs. The Federal Government has a far-flung tax-gathering machine consisting of collectors, administrators, field agents, deputies, clerks, stenographers, and what not. Administrative costs are high. I believe it has been estimated that the cost of collecting income taxes is about $2.17 per $100. It is in some respects slow and archaic. It has provoked 18 times more litigation than they have in Great Britain. In 1934 there were 20,446 of the 1931 tax returns still under investigation. There were an estimated 1,000 returns that were from 10 to 18 years old. Now add to that the administrative machinery of 31 different States which also gather income taxes and you get an appreciation of the enormous administrative and collection costs involved. These State costs for income-tax collection and administration range from 1 percent to 15 percent. It is an eloquent example of waste and inefficiency.

No two States have the same kind of bookkeeping and accounting. In the matter of corporate income taxes, capital gains and losses are treated one way in one State and in a different way in another. The net effect is that for enterprises doing business in many States, there are added costs in accounting to meet these diversities.

Consider the disturbing effect which conflicting taxation has upon the budget efforts of the various States. New sources of revenue may be tapped in order to set up a properly balanced budget only to find that regular or emergency legislation by the Federal Government a short while later has completely upset all State calculations. President Roosevelt while he was Governor of New York made this observation on the subject:

> This very week I have recommended to the legislature of this State four sources of additional revenue, each one of them an increase in existing taxes. Neither I nor the legislature has any knowledge of whether the Federal Government a month or two hence may or may not impose taxes on precisely these same sources. In the same way, neither the legislature nor I can, until this uncertainty is cleared up, take any practical steps to turn over any of our own tax sources to the local government units to help them out in the conduct of their local affairs. Even if the State were to allocate new tax sources to the cities or counties or towns, the whole system could be destroyed overnight by a sudden taxing of those same sources by Washington.

These observations do not pretend to be an exhaustive discussion of this subject. Nor does this pretend to be a sermon on the virtues of economy. I realize full well that as new demands are made upon State and Federal governments, new and increased revenues must be provided. I appreciate also that as both Federal and State expenditures reach higher and higher levels there is little hope that they will gradually recede. Our own fiscal history proves that cost of government never goes down to former levels. It is forever going up. And this very patent fact argues the point that as the States and the Federal Government go on and on in this mad and breathless race to uncover new sources of revenue or to push existing tax rates higher, overlapping and conflict and duplication of taxes becomes more and more entrenched. The longer this condition prevails, the more difficult it will be to remedy.

Some coordinated system must be worked out whereby excessive costs of tax collection and administration will be eliminated. Some agreement must be reached whereby certain spheres of revenue are relinquished to the States and other spheres to the Federal Government. Some uniformity of accounting must be effected to save vast sums to enterprises that do business in many States or throughout the Nation. These and many other problems must have immediate and sustained study before people rebel against the practices of the vast tax-gathering machines.

Already the States have given careful study to the matter and the report of the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation has pointed the way. It is now time for the Federal Government, through the Congress and through the Treasury, to lend its very best efforts to a cooperative effort with the States whereby a solution of this problem will be found.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 217, providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 217, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, after "public", insert "free of charge." Page 5, line 18, strike out "works" and insert "work." Page 5, line 18, strike out "exhibited in" and insert "included in the permanent collection of." Page 5, line 19, strike out "they are" and insert "it be."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this joint resolution for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE JUDICIARY

The SPEAKER. Under special order of the House heretofore made, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN] for 25 minutes.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of my statement I shall be glad to yield if I have any time remaining. Pending that, I prefer not to be interrupted.

I ask the indulgence of my colleagues while I speak on the President's proposal for reorganizing the Federal Judiciary.

At the outset let me say I regret the strong division on this question among members of the delegation from my own State; however, I accord to each of them, and likewise to every other Member of the Congress, sincerity and honesty of purpose and conviction; likewise, I retain the same attributes for myself.

This is a grave issue, and I am not unaware of its profound significance, not only as it relates itself to the present but because of its extending influence and effect on succeeding generations.

This is not the first time, however, that the country has been aroused on constitutional questions. Sixty-five delegates were elected by their respective constituencies to serve in the Constitutional Convention. Two from each of the States of New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, and Georgia, and one each from Virginia and Massachusetts, or a total of 10, through indifference or opposition declined to attend.

Patrick Henry, the celebrated Virginia orator, not only opposed the calling of the Convention but opposed ratification of the Constitution in the Virginia Convention. After its ratification Patrick Henry became one of its most earnest and loyal supporters.

Sixteen of the delegates did not sign the Constitution. Seven of them, John Lansing, Luther Martin, George Mason, John Francis Mercer, Elbridge Gerry, Edmond Randolph, and Robert Yates refused because of outright opposition to its adoption. Nine of them, on account of absence or illness, did not sign it. All of them later were warm supporters of the Constitution. The memories and achievements, both of the opponents and the proponents, merit the everlasting gratitude of the American people.

An illustration in one State, that of Virginia, shows the strong diversity of opinion among its delegates. Because of his constant efforts for a constitution, James Madison, of Virginia, was called the "Father of the Constitution." He sought and became a member of the State legislature in order to initiate the action which resulted in the framing of the Constitution. He was one of the most effective and influential members of the Constitutional Convention. Completing his useful career at the age of 85, he passed to his reward as the last survivor of the framers of the Constitution.

While Madison was the dominant figure in the Constitutional Convention, two of his colleagues from Virginia strongly opposed the Constitution and refused to sign it. Mason contended that the Constitution was not democratic enough and fought its adoption by Virginia in the convention of that State. Randolph opposed the reeligibility of the President for reelection, the granting of powers of pardon to the President, the establishment of the office of Vice President, equality of the States in the United States Senate, and, above all, the control of commerce by the United States Congress.

These three distinguished Virginians were supported by a divided opinion in their State. Madison's friends and admirers later elected him President of the United States, while George Mason was elected one of the first United States Senators from the State of Virginia, and Edmond Randolph was appointed by President Washington as the first Attorney General of the United States, later succeeding Thomas Jefferson as Secretary of State in President Washington's Cabinet.

It therefore can be seen clearly from this brief sketch of the differences of opinion among members of the Constitutional Convention regarding the meaning and interpretation of the Constitution, its adoption by the delegates, and subsequent ratification by the States that the acceptance of the Constitution as finally approved upon ratification by three-fourths of the States was not without conflict and compromise upon the part of many members of the Constitutional Convention and the respective State conventions.

It is equally clear and evident that any change in the Constitution proposed by Congress or the Chief Executive of the United States and the passage of laws by the Congress involving a Constitutional question immediately arouses a divergence of opinion.

Since no member of the delegation from my State who has prior claim or seniority has chosen to speak in behalf of the President's proposal to reorganize the Federal judiciary, I ask your sympathetic attention while I address myself to three or four phases of this controversial question.

I am supporting the President's proposal because I believe it to be constitutional; secondly, because I believe the facts and circumstances submitted by the President in his message to Congress justify the proposal. I am not supporting it because of high pressure nor for political expediency. The charge that has been hurled at proponents of this legislation, namely, that we are "rubber stamps", is silly, asinine, and ridiculous. This charge comes from those who would impugn the motives, honor, and integrity of duly elected Representatives of the people.

A great many ugly words and phrases have been injected into the discussions of this important question. "Dictator", "dictatorship", "packing the Supreme Court", "unpacking the Supreme Court", "usurpation of judicial functions", "destroying the Constitution", "a subservient judiciary", "destruction of liberty"—these and many other indictments have been hurled at the President and the Congress.

We can best judge the future by the past. Four years of Democratic administration under President Franklin D. Roosevelt is the best answer to these charges. Because of his humanitarian policies, his statesmanship, scholarship, and leadership, prosperity and happiness are abroad in the land, which conditions have been wrought out of chaos. Have you forgotten the dark and dismal clouds of despair, want, misery, and poverty which enveloped the Nation in 1931 and 1932? Have you forgotten the banking crisis of 1933?—Nineteen-cent corn and 20-cent wheat, 6-cent cotton, and 5-cent meat? Can it be possible that the opponents of this democratic proposal of a great Democratic President can forget so easily?

As a layman, may I present to you, in all sincerity and honesty, an excerpt taken from a letter written to me recently by a layman in my State. I quote:

I want to thank you for the stand you have taken with President Roosevelt on the Supreme Court. I, who am one of the rank and file who went to the polls last November and voted for Mr. Roosevelt—don't understand what all the shooting is about, but we understand the President. Continue to back him.

I grant you that there are most capable lawyers on both sides of this question, and, as usual, there are some in the middle or on the fence. The American Bar Association has registered its disapproval, while the National Lawyers' Guild has emphatically registered its unqualified approval. The Attorney General and the Assistant Attorney General of the United States have most emphatically outlined their reasons for the necessity and urgency of the President's proposal.

I have been wondering to whom the Constitution belongs, whether to the American Bar Association or to all the people of the United States. I have read it many times, and on various occasions, and I think I understand it. It is written in clear and simple English. Since I am a layman and have a great admiration—veneration is too strong a word—for the intricacies of legal reasoning, my thoughts will be phrased in questions. I do not want to argue; I am seeking and trying to pursue the truth. I have no desire to add my voice to the emotional feelings that have already sprung up, not only in Congress but among the people of the United States. The learned propaganda and the colored opinions which have poured forth upon us as Members of Congress and upon the public through the press, the radio, the United States mail, the opinions of newspaper columnists, and the misplaced fervor of certain groups in this country should be examined dispassionately.

A dispassionate examination discloses to rational minds that ours is a democratic form of government, which, if it means anything, means that the powers are derived from the consent of the governed. The Constitution is our fundamental law. It is the primary law of our Government and by definition that government derives all of its authority from the Constitution. As Webster defines it:

A constitution is a fundamental law of a state directing the principles upon which the Government is founded, and regulating the exercising of sovereign powers, directing to what bodies or persons these powers shall be confided and the manner of their exercise.

As Justice Cooley, that eminent authority on the Constitution, says, "It is but the framework of the political government."

There is no need of my reiterating to you the well-understood doctrine of checks and balances. I know, and you know, what are the duties of this legislative body. I know, and you know, what are the duties of the executive branch of our Government. But it is when I come to the judiciary that I, a layman, want to ask my legal friends some questions. I think I understand the Constitution. But when I pick up the Constitution and read what is the fundamental law of the United States and what the Constitution has to say about the Supreme Court, it is then that I begin to wonder why the lawyers are confused on the President's proposal to reorganize the judiciary. Article III seems to me perfectly clear. It says that the judicial power is to be vested in "one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuation in office." This is all that I can find in the Constitution about the Supreme Court. Therefore, I propound this first fundamental question: Where in the Constitution is anything said about the number of Justices? In fact, I will broaden the question. What is to prevent the President and the Senate from appointing and confirming 15, 25, 35, or even 50 Justices of the Supreme Court? What in the Constitution prohibits the appointment of only three or five Justices to the Supreme Court? Is there anything in the Constitution to prevent the appointment of all the Justices at the ages of 23 or 33, or any other age? Is there anything that would prevent the appointment of the Justices from Rumania, or from any other foreign country? Is there anything in the Constitution that requires the President to appoint Justices who are lawyers? Can you point out any restriction in the Constitution as to age, color, race, creed, ability, or citizenship as a prerequisite or requirement for appointment as a Justice on the Supreme Court bench? Therefore, I ask what is all the legal quibbling about?

These broad and discretionary powers delegated under the Constitution to the Chief Executive of the Nation in selecting proper persons for Supreme Court Justices convince me that the framers of the Constitution were willing to trust the President of the United States to exercise this important administrative function in a manner satisfactory for the most part to the majority of the people of the Nation. I am frank to tell you, that I believe the appointment of not more than two or three outstanding and distinguished laymen on the Supreme Court Bench would add greatly to the proper consideration by the Supreme Court of facts and circumstances involved in cases before the Supreme Court. Since juries are made up of laymen, on whose judgment rests the great majority of verdicts of the courts, I can see no justifiable reason why two or three laymen on the Supreme Court Bench would not be equally valuable in the consideration and determination of questions of facts.

May I submit to my colleagues another question: Under the Constitution, as quoted in article III, why cannot Congress increase or decrease the number of justices at its pleasure? History tells us in its recorded pages that this has been done from time to time. In 1789 the Supreme Court was established with 6 members; in 1801 the number was reduced to 5; in 1807 it was increased to 7; in 1837 it was increased to 9; in 1863 it was increased to 10; in 1866 it was reduced to 7; and in 1869 it was increased to 9. Opponents of the proposed legislation must be honest and admit one of two propositions: Either we did not need 10 Justices of the Supreme Court in 1863, when the population of our country was less than 40,000,000 people, or we need more than 9 Justices now, with a population of more than three times that of 1863. This is simple logic that can be easily understood.

It is therefore clearly within the Constitution that the President and the Congress have the right under the Constitution, as evidenced by precedent, to increase or decrease the number of Justices of the Supreme Court. Under the present law, Justices with 10 years' service are eligible for retirement at age 70, with full retirement pay. Without reflection upon any of my colleagues or opposition from whatever source, I have heard no argument either of facts, law, or precedent, that justifies the iniquitous charge that the President of the United States is laying the foundation for dictatorship, or that Congress is not within its constitutional prerogatives.

Now I come to another paramount question and I approach it seriously and candidly. I challenge my lawyer friends to give me a satisfactory answer to this question: Where, in the Constitution is the Supreme Court given the power to invalidate acts of Congress? The Constitution itself is silent. Of course, I have heard and read much of the famous Marbury versus Madison. I know that a great deal has been written and spoken upon this very question from the time of the Constitutional Convention down to this very moment. For example, in April 1906, Chief Justice Clark, of North Carolina, said, speaking at the Pennsylvania Law School:

> The action of the Supreme Court in assuming the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional was without a line in the Constitution to authorize it, either expressly or by implication. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 15, 1908, pp. 8063–65.)

The remarks of this learned judge seem to accord with my point of view as a layman. In studying the question I thought that both of us might be wrong.

Concluding, that even though the Constitution does not say so in expressed words, perchance by some process of implication which I as a layman did not understand, it might be possible for the Supreme Court to get this power out of the Constitution. Realizing that this case and question has agitated legal minds for many years, I decided to go to an even greater authority than Chief Justice Clark, of North Carolina. Where did this power come from? The question has been answered at least to my satisfaction by a book entitled "The Supreme Court of the United States." Its author is the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. On page 87 of this book Chief Justice Hughes says: "By the Supreme Court itself the question was determined in Marbury versus Madison." "By the Supreme Court itself"—that answers my question. Frankly, I had thought, as a layman, that the Supreme Court or the judiciary was under the Constitution—and not over the Constitution. Granting that Chief Justice Hughes' statement is correct, and I am convinced that it is, then the Supreme Court by itself, gave its own tribunal, without a semblance of authority from the Constitution, the power to invalidate acts of Congress. If the above statement quoted from Chief Justice Hughes' book entitled, "The Supreme Court of the United States," does not prove my contention, then what does it prove?

Although the three departments of Government, the legislative, the judicial, and the executive, are separate and distinct and independent units of the Government, it is clear to me that the Supreme Court invaded the legislative branch of the Government and assumed for itself a legislative function which, under the Constitution, rests with the Congress.

And now I come to another question: Why do not judges pay an income tax on their salaries? They are the only employees of the Federal Government who are not subject to pay an income tax on their salaries. Some of us have just undergone the experience of filling out income-tax reports. Although it may hurt a little to separate ourselves from a few hundred dollars for income taxes, I agree with the remark of the late Justice Holmes when he said that "it was a privilege to pay taxes, because they are a small price to pay for the gift of civilization." I can find nothing in the Constitution about an income tax, and so I have no particular quarrel with the Supreme Court which held in 1895 that it was unconstitutional. But I can still read the English language; and when the income-tax amendment was passed in 1913 it read that all incomes were subject to taxation, "from whatever source derived." Yet the Supreme Court 6 years later said, in a split decision, that judges do not have to pay an income tax on their salaries because that would be diminishing their compensation during their period of office. This was held to be unconstitutional. Let us look at the facts: Article III of the Constitution declares salaries of judges cannot be reduced during their period of office. For one, I do not agree that the framers of the Constitution intended this language to mean an exemption from the payment of income tax. I think the framers of the Constitution meant the salaries could not be reduced by a specific act of Congress. The Income Tax Amendment of 1913 that makes it clear that all incomes, from whatever source derived, are taxable would be flexible and yet specific enough to include an income tax on salaries of Justices of the Supreme Court.

As a layman I have some satisfaction in knowing that some of our greatest judges have handed down decisions which are in line with my conviction. In Evans versus Gore, decided in 1919, in which the majority held that the salaries of judges could not be taxed, Justice Holmes, in a notable dissent in which Mr. Justice Brandeis concurred, said:

> A second and independent reason why this tax appears to me valid is that, even if I am wrong as to the scope of the original document, the sixteenth amendment justifies the tax, whatever would have been the law before it was applied. By that amendment, Congress is given power to "collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived." It is true that it goes on "without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration" and this shows the particular difficulty that led to it. But the only cause of that difficulty was an attempt to trace income to its source, and it seems to me that the amendment was intended to put an end to the cause and not merely to obviate a single result. I do not see how judges can claim an abatement of their income tax on the ground that an item in their gross income is salary, when the power is given expressly to tax income from whatever source derived.

I have asked these questions in order to let the opposition show whether or not they can submit satisfactory proof to substantiate their charges. The decision recited from Justice Holmes shows to me clearly that the Supreme Court had no authority to exempt Justices from payment of income taxes—and that after 18 years of debate attempt to remedy this state of affairs was nullified by the Supreme Court in an unusually bold example of "tortured construction" of the Constitution.

Marshall's decision in Marbury versus Madison has made the American people forget that the judicial branch of our Government is not supreme to the other two branches of the Government. This decision has made the people of the United States forget that neither of the branches is independent of the others, and neither is superior to the others. The functions of the three branches of Government are so clearly defined that the executive is not the inferior of the judicial, any more than it is the superior of the legislative branch, and yet, unless this proposal is enacted into law, the Members of this Congress must accept the fact that their inactivity has the full force and effect of the seal of unlawful authority on the obviously unlawful action of the Supreme Court in its assumption of legislative prerogatives.

If Congress remains inert and passive it will have recognized that although its duty under the Constitution was to be the national legislative body, it will have subordinated itself to a higher and, shall I say, superlegislative body? It has been pointed out that the Constitution is what the judges say it is. If I understand the Constitution, the framers did not intend that the Supreme Court should be regarded by the American people as a superhouse of lords.

Years ago the same struggle which now faces this country was fought out in England between the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MERRITT). The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN] has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have sufficient time to complete his remarks.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEEN. That struggle ended as only true believers in democracy must have wished it to end—in victory for the House of Commons—a body elected by the English people and responsive to them, over another body not elected by the people but appointed by the King and holding office for life. In that situation let it be remembered that the House of Lords, by their own action, stripped themselves of their veto power over the House of Commons. Today in England there is no judicial review, nor any superlegislature with ultimate authority over a statute passed by the people's elected legislature.

The warning of Madison in 1789, when he said that the courts should have no veto power over the acts of legislators, is just as timely today; however, I do not subscribe to the policy that action by the legislators should not be reviewable by the courts. I do contend, however, that the assumed power of the Supreme Court to invalidate acts of Congress is not within the Constitution. Madison points out:

The judiciary department, paramount in fact to the legislature, was never intended and can never be proper.

Jefferson, in his memoirs, puts it more bluntly when he remarks:

To consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy.

May I add in this connection at this point that if I am wrong I am following Madison and Jefferson and other distinguished Democrats who helped frame this Government.

In addition to the timely words of these two Presidents of the United States, other Presidents have objected strenuously from time to time to the usurped power of the judiciary over the other two branches of the Government. May I point out to you that several Presidents have recommended to the Congress from time to time a revision of the Federal judiciary. Presidents George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson, Franklin Pierce, Abraham Lincoln, Chester A. Arthur, and Grover Cleveland. All of these commented on the necessity for reform of the judiciary in their annual messages to Congress.

In the light of our history may I ask wherein is there anything revoluntionary or unprecedented in President Franklin D. Roosevelt's proposal to reorganize the judiciary?

Much has been said in recent days about the due-process clause and about the commerce clause of the Constitution. In my study of this whole problem I have found a great many noble decisions on these two points. After the Civil War, when the various States began to pass laws regulating freight rates, an attempt was made to have these laws declared unconstitutional, as violating the due-process clause. However, in 1876 a divided Court held that the Court could regulate prices charged by public utilities although it is a violation of the due-process clause to fix the price of commodities such as cotton, groceries, and automobiles (Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113). The Constitution itself makes no distinction between regulation of public utilities and private business. It is now a well established part of the "unwritten" divisions of our Constitution that public utilities can be subjected to a rather high degree of governmental regulation, although private business can be regulated to only a very limited extent.

When the Supreme Court decided that public-utility rates could be regulated, it definitely suggested that there was no constitutional restriction whatsoever on the rate which the Government might set. It was not long, however, before the Court developed the rule that the rate fixed might be "reasonable." By "reasonable" is meant what the Court in its opinion considers reasonable. Even though the Interstate Commerce Commission decides that a railroad freight rate is reasonable, the rate nevertheless is unconstitutional, if it is adjudged as being unreasonable in the opinion of the majority of the members of the Supreme Court. Not infrequently the Supreme Court has held unconstitutional an electric rate, which a State legislature and a State public-service commission have found to be reasonable.

More and more frequently the Supreme Court is exercising this power of unreasonable, arbitrary, or capricious authority in its interpretation on the unconstitutionality of laws. Between 1920 and 1930 more State laws were held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States than during the entire period of 52 years of the history of the fourteenth amendment.

The charge has been made that the President's proposal is not a party question. I deny that charge, and, for one, I contend that when the American people rendered their verdict in November 1936, as approving or disapproving the policies of the present Democratic administration, they—the voters and taxpayers—by a large majority, subscribed to the President's philosophy of looking forward. The proposal to reorganize the judiciary comes from our Democratic President, approved and supported by the leadership of both the House and Senate, and I, for one, propose to support the proposition. It is true, however, that I have not agreed with the President or the Congress on some of the measures recommended and enacted into law. As a humble Member of this body and as an American, my first duty under my oath of office is to act on my best judgment, thought, and intelligence in legislating for the whole country and for the greatest good to the largest number of people. In supporting this measure I feel I am rendering that kind of service to my country.

As a Democrat and believing in our principles of democratic government, and as a supporter and an admirer of the President, I propose to stand by the administration which has meant so much to labor, to business, to industry, to agriculture, and to almost every phase of human endeavor.

At this point I am reminded of that ancient fable which tells the story of an archer who, seeing a large eagle soaring in the sky above, drew back his bow and let fly at the eagle an arrow which pierced the eagle's heart and brought him to the ground. While lying on the ground dying, the eagle slightly moved his head and looked up into the face of the man who shot him and said: "It is not the arrow that pierces my heart and which is killing me that hurts so badly, but it is the fact that the feathers in that arrow came from without my own wing."

My colleagues on the Democratic side, may it not be said that we furnished the feathers for the arrow which pierced the heart of a great humanitarian and Executive in the White House, by our failure to carry out the mandate of the American people, expressed at the polls in November 1936. [Applause.]

If I have any time remaining, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would not undertake to embarrass the gentleman's very splendid discussion by propounding questions to him. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 3 minutes.

Mr. DEEN. Well, I am within my time and I should like to reply to my colleague by saying that I will attempt to answer any questions he may ask.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman is eager, I will undertake to accommodate his need.

Mr. DEEN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that the gentleman is contending we should adopt this proposal to reform the judiciary in order to get an enlarged Court that will give a meaning to the Constitution that is different to the meaning given by the Court as now constituted?

Mr. DEEN. I did not so state in my remarks.

Mr. COX. Whether the gentleman stated it or not, is that his understanding of the meaning and purpose of the proposal?

Mr. DEEN. Does the gentleman mean is that my understanding?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. DEEN. My understanding is that the President desires to have these additional judges in order to expedite matters before the Supreme Court.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean by that, that the record has disclosed that the business of the court is so far in arrears that it is necessary to enlarge the membership to speed up the handling of the business?

Mr. DEEN. My answer would be "yes", for the reason that the Supreme Court heard less than 20 percent of the cases submitted last year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would not intentionally undertake to detract in the slightest from the very splendid statement just delivered by my colleague, Mr. Deen. However, if this demand that is now pressed upon the Congress for a new Court to give a new interpretation to the Constitution should be adopted, the Federal Government will then have taken into its ravenous maw all State power, and the fight of a century and a half for federalization of the activities of the people will have been accomplished, and this country moved up perilously close to the brink of despotism.

Mr. Speaker, I did not ask for time in order to make that statement, but to refer to an entirely different matter.

The sit-down strike, which constitutes the seizure and holding of private property for ransom, is anarchy in its worst form.

The performance of labor in the Detroit area is a disgrace to the Nation, and is a condition that labor itself must take immediate steps to correct. I am not insisting that defiance of the courts calls for Federal intervention, it being more properly a matter for the States to handle; but it does call for expressions of condemnation from people in places of authority in the Federal Government.

Our Department of Labor has seemingly locked its doors and suspended business. Its temporizing has been given the meaning of open connivance. The Major Berry outfit has done nothing more than add fuel to the flames, and a statement credited to a gentleman at the other end of the Capitol appearing in the papers yesterday does no good. Referring to the question of Federal intervention, this gentleman said:

> Until the Supreme Court has passed upon the validity of the statute referred to (the Wagner Labor Relations Board), it is exceedingly difficult to make advancements.

This is another back-handed lick at the Supreme Court and is not persuasive. To create a condition of disrespect for the courts and open defiance of their decrees, and then charge them with responsibility for this state of lawlessness, is conduct which is not becoming honest men. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1938

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 5779) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 433), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order against the bill.

THE SUPREME COURT ISSUE

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, no one who has given studious attention to the President's proposal touching the Supreme Court of the United States can fail to be impressed by the evidence it offers of pronounced tendency toward executive absolutism.

When all the President's arguments are analyzed they reduce simply to this—that Mr. Roosevelt is displeased and annoyed by certain decisions of the honorable Court and desires, therefore, to change the personnel with a view to forcing from the Court exactly the kind of decisions he thinks it ought to render. That is the real argument and purpose behind this shocking thrust at the independence of our judiciary—and no amount of camouflage, no amount of demagogic distortion, can conceal this destructive purpose from public examination. And destructive in purpose this program undeniably is, for if the people once surrender the independence of the judiciary, the essential function of the tri-partite system of checks and balances in government has been destroyed, and the whole system of personal liberties and individual rights built up during more than 700 years of Anglo-Saxon law, will be at the mercy of the Executive.

All too few are the working systems of representative government in the world today. Since the World War they have been crushed successively by the European dictatorships of blood and iron. If, in these circumstances, America surrenders to dictatorship, the spiritual, social, and moral progress of centuries will be cast aside.

ISSUE NOT A PARTISAN ONE

And yet this momentous issue—an issue which touches the elemental individual liberties of every citizen in the land—is bluntly submitted by Postmaster General Farley as a strictly partisan question. Let me read what he said on this point before a party gathering in North Carolina 10 days ago:

> It seems to me—
>
> Said Mr. Farley—
> that the reorganization plan comes directly into the class of those matters on which party loyalty should be the guiding principle.

Thus, according to Mr. Farley's definition, this is only a question of party loyalty—although it is in fact the gravest issue this country has faced in two generations. Happily for all, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Farley cannot make it a party issue. The debates transcend by far the bounds of party loyalty. In the Senate particularly have defenders of the Constitution, Democrats and Republicans alike, consolidated their forces to check the President's reckless assault upon the American system of representative government.

PRESIDENT HAS CONSISTENTLY SOUGHT ENLARGEMENT OF HIS POWERS

But let me point out one additional fact of singular significance in this connection. It is this: Every major proposal submitted by President Roosevelt thus far in the present session of Congress has been earmarked by the same underlying tendency toward the concentration of power in the White House. First there came to us the sweeping proposals for the reorganization of the executive branch, with its suggestion for the abolition of the General Accounting Office, the Civil Service Commission, and the centralization of the independent commissions under the Presidential wing. Here was the most astonishing grasping for authority ever proposed to Congress by an Executive. If passed, these recommendations will focus every power of the executive branch and virtually all of the quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial powers of the independent commissions as well in the White House. It will give the President powers equal to those exercised by the domineering rulers of several foreign countries I could mention, where representative government no longer exists. Only control over the Supreme Court then will be needed to complete the basic machinery of dictatorship.

But these were not all. In the neutrality legislation the executive branch once more reached out for absolute power. The administration program, as embodied in the bill passed yesterday by the House, is to vest in the President the widest possible discretionary authority in the matter of neutrality, wartime trade, embargoes, foreign credits, and noncombatant shipping. And this after the congressional power over tariffs and trade agreements had been renewed, after the Presidential power to issue paper money had been extended, and after numerous additional extensions of "emergency" powers had been placed in the legislative hoppers of the House and Senate.

Such a consistent effort for concentration of power is most significant.

What does it mean to the American system of constitutional government when we find, as in the present session of Congress, that every piece of legislation submitted calls for only one essential thing—more and more Presidential power?

That is the great issue before America today.

THE DANGER OF GOOD INTENTIONS

To say that all of these attempts at centralizing power in the President are steps on the road to dictatorship is not to challenge the good intentions of those who advocate them. The lesson of history is clear that every autocrat began with the purest intentions of exercising his increasing powers wisely and benevolently.

Indeed, we have a classic statement of this intention from Daniel Webster. Nearly a century ago he declared:

> It is hardly too strong to say that the Constitution was made to guard the people against the dangers of good intentions, real or intended. * * * There are men in all ages who mean to govern well; but they mean to govern; they promise to be kind masters, but they mean to be masters. They think they need but little restraint upon themselves. Their notion of the public interest is apt to be quite closely connected with their own exercise of authority. They may not, indeed, always understand their own motives. The love of power may sink too deep in their own hearts even for their own security and may pass with themselves for mere patriotism and benevolence.

Our own history offers eloquent evidence that the American people will not submit knowingly to such unwholesome concentration of powers. A most impressive example of our inherent and instinctive resistance of such tendencies was given as recently as 1918 when President Wilson appealed to the country to return a Congress pledged in advance to support of his policies in war and peace.

This appeal for a blank check aroused the Nation. The results we know—a Republican majority in Congress.

PRESIDENT HAS DISAGREED IN PAST WITH HIS OWN PROPOSAL

We have it in Mr. Roosevelt's own words that the proposal he now submits touching the Supreme Court is not a solution for the situation he seeks to change.

In his message of February 5, it will be recalled, the President recommended enlargement of the Court on the single ground that its docket was congested and it could not keep abreast of its work. It has been demonstrated beyond all question that the Court has been fully abreast of its docket for more than 5 years.

But now there comes to light the President's own declaration against more judges as a solution of court congestion, even where congestion actually exists.

In his book Looking Forward, published a month after his inauguration in 1933, Mr. Roosevelt dealt at some length with the question of congested court dockets. Here are his words, from page 195 of that book:

> The only way to attack the problem is by rigorous application of judicial efficiency. In the face of this congestion, the remedy commonly proposed is to add new judges or new courts; but it will readily be seen that if the problem is what I have stated it to be, such a so-called remedy merely aggravates the complaint.

Thus the Nation now is confronted with the bewildering spectacle of the President demanding vigorously a solution which he himself has declared emphatically "merely aggravates the complaint."

Moreover, as applied to the Supreme Court, this Presidential solution now is urged against a problem of congestion which in fact does not exist.

THE DUTY OF THE COURTS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Speaker, the people at all times have complete control over their Government. Under the Constitution they have set up a Federal Government with certain designated powers, and in the tenth amendment they have specifically provided as follows:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

If the people are at any time of the opinion that the Federal powers should be enlarged or contracted, provision is made in article V of the Constitution for amendments thereto. In the century and a half that has passed since the Constitution was adopted, 21 amendments have been added.

Article VI of the Constitution provides that the Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Article III of the Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. It is the obvious duty of the courts to expound the law. Since only statutes "made in pursuance of" the Constitution, together with the Constitution itself, are "the supreme law of the land", the courts must, of necessity, decide whether the statutes enacted by Congress are consistent with the Constitution. Without such authority in the courts, the Constitution would be absolutely meaningless. As the Supreme Court has many times pointed out, it is not the function of the judges to inquire into the desirability of legislation. The following passage from the Supreme Court's decision in the Triple A case sets forth in clear and concise terms the true function of the judiciary. I quote:

> It is sometimes said that the Court assumes a power to overrule or control the action of the people's representatives. This is a misconception. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land ordained and established by the people. All legislation must conform to the principles it lays down. When an act of Congress is appropriately challenged in the courts as not conforming to the constitutional mandate the judicial branch of the Government has only one duty—to lay the article of the Constitution which is invoked beside the statute which is challenged and to decide whether the latter squares with the former. All the Court does, or can do, is to announce its considered judgment upon the question. The only power it has, if such it may be called, is the power of judgment. This Court neither approves nor condemns any legislative policy. Its delicate and difficult office is to ascertain and declare whether the legislation is in accordance with, or in contravention of, the provisions of the Constitution and, having done that, its duty ends.
> The question is not what power the Federal Government ought to have but what powers in fact have been given by the people.

The founding fathers, in establishing our Government, set up three coordinate branches—the legislative, executive, and judicial. It was the intention that the legislative branch should make the law, the executive branch enforce it, and the judicial branch expound it. Each was to be independent of the other. This division of power constitutes what is known as the American system of checks and balances.

PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL PRESENTS GRAVE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

From the beginning of our history until now, this system has been steadfastly maintained. At the present time, however, the people of this country are face to face with a grave constitutional crisis. The question is whether the Executive, who has already exercised a dominating influence over the legislative branch of the Government, shall be permitted to gain actual control over the judicial branch by the appointment of six new Justices to the Supreme Court who will decide cases as the President wants them decided.

The storm of protest which has arisen all over the country, from people of all political parties, from all walks of life, from so-called liberals and conservatives, is evidence that the people are not seduced by the President's sophistry. His insincerity of purpose is attested by the fact that he has now shifted his ground, and instead of continuing to argue the alleged congestion in the Supreme Court he has come into the open and virtually admitted that his real object is to secure a Supreme Court which will throw the Constitution to the winds and uphold whatever legislation he may propose.

COURTS GIVE PRESUMPTION OF VALIDITY TO ACTS OF CONGRESS

In his so-called fireside chat of March 9 the President asserted that the Supreme Court should resolve all reasonable doubt in favor of the constitutionality of a statute passed by Congress. That is exactly what the Court does. Allow me to cite the following statement in the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Adkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U. S. 525, 544):

> The judicial duty of passing upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress is one of great gravity and delicacy. The statute here in question has successfully borne the scrutiny of the legislative branch of the Government, which, by enacting it, has affirmed its validity; and that determination must be given great weight. This Court, by an unbroken line of decisions from Chief Justice Marshall to the present day, has steadily adhered to the rule that every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of an act of Congress until overcome beyond rational doubt. But if by clear and indubitable demonstration a statute be opposed to the Constitution we have no choice but to say so.

Thus we see that the Supreme Court, from its earliest history to the present time, has followed the rule that the President favors. However, I call attention to the fact that the President is not satisfied with merely resolving all reasonable doubts in favor of the validity of a statute. It was he who sent a letter to the Ways and Means Committee not long ago asking that we not allow any doubts as to constitutionality, "however reasonable", to block the enactment of the original Guffey coal bill, which the Court subsequently invalidated.

COURTS DO NOT PRESUME TO PASS ON LEGISLATIVE POLICY

The President charged in his fireside chat that the Supreme Court had been assuming the power to pass on the "wisdom" of acts of Congress, and that it had acted as a policy-making body rather than as a judicial body. Here again the President is misrepresenting the Court's position. Time and time again the Court has emphasized that it was not concerned with the wisdom of legislation, but only with the question of whether it is authorized by the Constitution. In the celebrated N. R. A. case, Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for a unanimous Court, said:

It is not the province of the Court to consider the economic advantages or disadvantages of such a centralized system. It is sufficient to say that the Federal Constitution does not provide for it.

This statement coincides with the quotation from the Court's decision in the A. A. A. case, to which I previously referred, in which the Court said that it "neither approves nor condemns any legislative policy."

PRESIDENT WANTS COURTS TO REWRITE CONSTITUTION BY JUDICIAL INTERPRETATION

The President falsely charges the Supreme Court with having assumed the functions of a superlegislative body. As a matter of fact, it is due to the circumstance that the Court has not assumed the power to pass on the wisdom of legislation that the present controversy has arisen. That is exactly what the President wants the Court to do. He complains because the Court does not forget about the limited powers granted to the Federal Government under the Constitution and uphold legislation because the Federal Government "ought to have" the power. But as the Court said in the Triple A case:

The question is not what power the Federal Government ought to have but what powers in fact have been given by the people.

The President says that he wants a Supreme Court that will enforce the Constitution "as written." That is not what he wants at all. He wants a Supreme Court that will rewrite the Constitution by judicial interpretation and thus usurp the power which the people have reserved to themselves to change the Constitution as and when they see fit. He wants to rewrite the Constitution without resorting to the constitutional method of amendment and without giving the people the opportunity to pass upon the wisdom of the changes he has in mind.

PRESIDENT HAS TURNED HIS BACK ON DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

The Democratic platform of 1936, the terms of which the President himself is said to have dictated, in referring to the pressing national problems stated:

If these problems cannot be effectively solved by legislation within the Constitution, we shall seek such clarifying amendment as will assure to the legislatures of the several States and to the Congress of the United States, each within its proper jurisdiction, the power to enact those laws which the State and Federal legislatures, within their respective spheres, shall find necessary, in order adequately to regulate commerce, protect public health and safety, and safeguard economic security. Thus we propose to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

In advocating the packing of the Supreme Court by the appointment of six more Justices, the President turns his back squarely on the platform of his party. He seeks to enlarge the Federal power not through the constitutional method of amendment, in which the people would be called upon to say whether or not they wished to grant such extension of power, but through the indirect method of loose judicial interpretation by his own selected judges.

The President's "back door" method has been justly condemned by the people, including many thousands of those who voted for him in the 1936 election. This is no partisan issue. It transcends in importance all party considerations. Constitutional government is at stake, and all those who love their country and its institutions are waging a common fight against a proposal which would undermine the basic principles upon which this Nation was founded.

Having cited the Democratic platform, I wish to quote from the Republican platform in regard to the constitutional issue. Here is what the Republican platform of 1936 states:

We pledge ourselves to maintain the American system of constitutional and local self-government, and to resist all attempts to impair the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, the final protector of the rights of our citizens against the arbitrary encroachments of the legislative and executive branches of government. There can be no individual liberty without an independent judiciary.

Thus it appears that the platforms of both major parties stand squarely for preserving our constitutional system. This definitely takes the burning question of the hour completely out of the realm of politics. I reiterate that this is not a partisan question, irrespective of what the party platforms provide.

What I have to say I do not say in a partisan spirit. If this proposal had been made by a President of my own political faith, I would still be one of the first to voice my opposition. I would emulate the example of those noble Democrats who in the present controversy have put country above party in opposing their President.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON'S WARNING

The warning of President Washington in his Farewell Address has been frequently quoted, but in my opinion it cannot be too often referred to. The Father of our Country said:

If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional power be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

The President's proposal to "pack" the Supreme Court with judges known to be in accord with his views would completely destroy the independence of the judiciary and the confidence of the people in its integrity. It would henceforth be a political court, and the precedent which would be set in the present instance by the addition of six judges might be duplicated from time to time in the future by subsequent Presidents who might wish to secure decisions in conformity with their individual views.

PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL ESTABLISHES BAD PRECEDENT

The present occupant of the White House wishes to "pack" the Court for the purpose of securing a loose interpretation of the commerce clause and the reading into the Constitution of what is not there—a supposed grant of power to legislate "for the general welfare." However, some future President may want to "pack" the Court for the purpose of securing a more narrow interpretation of the so-called Bill of Rights, otherwise known as the first ten amendments. Or he may want to secure more drastic enforcement of the fourteenth amendment, with which our friends in the South are so familiar. As a matter of fact, it is conceivable that the very judges whom the present occupant of the White House would appoint to secure a more loose interpretation of the commerce clause might favor more strict construction of some of the other provisions of the Constitution.

NO POWER UNDER CONSTITUTION TO LEGISLATE "FOR GENERAL WELFARE"

I should like to refer briefly to the President's suggestion in his fireside chat that the framers of the Constitution gave to the Congress—I quote:

The ample, broad powers "to levy taxes * * * and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Mr. Speaker, that is a very ingenious phrasing of the taxing clause in the Constitution, but it is not what the taxing clause says. The President left out a lot of words in between the first and last part of the clause. The Constitution does not give the Congress the power to legislate "for the general welfare." Here is what it provides:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

The plain import of this provision is that Congress shall have the power to levy taxes for the purpose of providing for the common defense and general welfare. Every schoolboy knows this. The fathers who wrote the Constitution knew this. And the Supreme Court has many times held this to be the case. This, for example, was the holding in the Triple A case, in which the Court said:

The clause thought to authorize the legislation—the first—confers upon the Congress power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States * * *." It is not contended that this provision grants power to regulate agricultural production upon the theory that such legislation would promote the general welfare. The Government concedes that the phrase "to provide for the general welfare" qualifies the power to "lay and collect taxes." The view that the clause grants power to provide for the general welfare, independently of the taxing power, has never been authoritatively accepted. Mr. Justice Story points out that if it were adopted "it is obvious that under color of the generality of the words, to 'provide for the common defense and general welfare', the Government of the United States is, in reality, a government of general and unlimited powers, notwithstanding the subsequent enumeration of specific powers." The true construction undoubtedly is that the only thing granted is the power to tax for the purpose of providing funds for payment of the Nation's debts and making provision for the general welfare.

PRESIDENT HIMSELF HAS TIPPED BALANCE OF POWERS

If I may refer again to the President's fireside chat, he stated that, in his opinion, the balance of powers between the three great branches of the Government had been "tipped out of balance" by the courts, and said that it was his purpose "to restore that balance."

As a matter of fact, the disturbance of the balance is of his own making. Heretofore the legislative, executive, and judicial branches have preserved their independence, each confining themselves to their own spheres. The President has already tipped the balance by asserting control over the Congress. Now he wishes to secure control of the third branch and tip the scales all the way.

In his speech of March 4th, at the victory dinner in Washington, the President used a metaphor which, while not exactly apropos, at least illustrates his frame of mind. He stated that "there is no definite assurance that the three-horse team of the American system of Government will pull together", and added:

If three well-matched horses are put to the task of plowing up a field where the going is heavy and the team of three pull as one the field will be plowed. If one horse lies down in the traces or plunges off in another direction, the field will not be plowed.

The analogy is not a good one because a three-horse team would of necessity have a driver. What the President probably had in mind was that if he, as one member of the three-horse team, could sit in the driver's seat, everything would be fine.

The President, of course, meant to infer that it was the horse representing the Supreme Court that had broken the traces. He knows very well that it is the horse representing the Executive that has done this. Instead of plowing the field in regular furrows, he has headed off in every direction, run around in circles, and tried all sorts of unorthodox methods.

YAWNING PRECIPICE OF DICTATORSHIP JUST AHEAD

My friend from North Carolina, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. DOUGHTON], is one of those who, under the President's gratuitous dictum, is to be regarded as unfit for further service under the three score and ten age limit. Of course, those of us who know him realize that there is no more active man in this body than the gentleman from North Carolina and that his faculties for continued distinguished service in this body are in no way impaired. On May 17, 1929, the gentleman from North Carolina uttered some words on this floor which I would like to repeat in connection with the President's Supreme Court proposal. He said:

It seems that the more power men are given the more they are obsessed with a morbid gluttony for increased power. My friends, it is time to pause and call a halt, to stop, think, look, and listen before we go over the yawning precipice just ahead of us.

Mr. Speaker, that statement is particularly apropos of the President's proposal to give him, in effect, six votes on the Supreme Court. When the President combines his power as Chief Executive with working control of the Congress and complete domination over the judiciary, he becomes in fact a one-man government. Whether we like the word or not, he would have all the powers possessed by a dictator. And even though he might be a "benign" dictator, he would be a dictator in effect none the less.

In view of the foregoing quotation from the gentleman from North Carolina, it will be interesting to note how he votes if and when the proposed measure comes before the House.

In his speech of March 4, 1937, the President said:

Democracy in many lands has failed for the time being to meet human needs. People have become so fed up with futile debate and party bickerings over methods that they have been willing to surrender democratic processes and principles in order to get things done.

Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what the President is asking be done in his proposal to pack the Supreme Court. He is unwilling to make use of the democratic process of constitutional amendment. He wants to take a short-cut via the "usurpation" route. He ignores his own warning that "the ultimate failures of dictatorships cost humanity far more than any temporary failures of democracy."

INVALIDATED LEGISLATION NOT CAREFULLY CONSIDERED

Again in his fireside chat of March 9, the President reiterated that "we will not allow ourselves to run around in new circles of futile discussion and debate, always postponing the day of decision." Of course the whole trouble with the President's program, and one of the reasons for its having received so many adverse decisions at the hands of the courts, has been that virtually every piece of legislation he suggested was rushed through Congress with only cursory examination and without adequate debate. If there had been more discussion and debate, perhaps more of the legislation would have been upheld. When legislation is passed "without regard to doubts as to constitutionality, however reasonable", it is no fault of the Court that the legislation must be held unconstitutional. When legislation is passed without careful consideration, Congress should not be surprised if, in its actual administration, it is found to achieve unconstitutional ends.

WHAT IS THE EMERGENCY OF WHICH THE PRESIDENT SPEAKS?

The President has said that "time is of the essence" in the consideration of his proposal. He has previously gone up and down the country telling the people that happy days are here again; that the emergency is over; that prosperity has returned. Now he pictures a great emergency facing the country, which cannot await the delay incident to the adoption of a constitutional amendment. Of course, the only reason "time is of the essence" is that the President does not want the people to have sufficient time to digest his proposal. He knows that the longer the people examine it, the more convinced they will be that it is dangerous and undesirable. In the time that has already elapsed, the specious arguments which he advanced in support of his proposal have been broken down. The opposition to his cunning and clever scheme is growing like a prairie fire.

In his victory dinner address, the President asserted that he had "just begun to fight." But who, I would ask, is he fighting? Is there a civil war going on in this country? If so, what are we fighting about? Perhaps some of us would like to get into it.

The only fight I know of right now is the fight between the President and his supporters, on the one hand, who would tear down the Constitution, and those of us who are fighting to maintain our constitutional system of government.

If the President refers to any other kind of a fight, then, like Don Quixote, he is just fighting windmills. If he refers to a fight for humanitarian legislation, for social progress, and so on, then we are all on one side. The only difference may be in the method by which those ends are to be achieved. The President wants to achieve them by destroying the Constitution. Those who oppose him want to achieve them in an orderly, constitutional manner.

EXAMPLE OF PRESIDENT'S IMPULSIVENESS

Perhaps all arguments pro and con on the subject of increasing the membership of the Supreme Court have been made. The only thing new will be the manner in which various persons will express their views. I want, however, to contribute a very illuminating incident which I am quite certain has not appeared in the discussion which has taken place since the 5th of February.

The following extract from an editorial which recently appeared in a New England paper describes an incident which occurred on September 7, 1932:

> In his first campaign for the Presidency, Mr. Roosevelt, escorted by State troopers on motorcycles, rushed up to Bennington College, arrived by mistake at a back entrance, barred by a padlocked gate, halted briefly while one of the troopers drew a revolver and shot away the lock, and swept smilingly down upon his startled hosts from the rear. He could have driven around to the regular approach provided by the owners of the premises, or sent word that he was at the rear entrance and asked the owners to unlock the gate, but either of these alternatives would have taken a little time. To Mr. Roosevelt the important consideration at the moment was plainly the simple fact that this gate blocked the road on which he was traveling, and the quickest and simplest way to overcome the difficulty and proceed with his own schedule was to blow the gate out of the way. The circumstance that in sanctioning this procedure he was destroying somebody's property and breaking his way into somebody's premises through the use of force employed by a police officer, whose duty it would have been to arrest anyone else doing the same thing, obviously did not cross Mr. Roosevelt's mind * * *.
> As at Bennington, the important consideration at the moment is his own desire to go ahead in his own way—the simple solution, to shoot away the lock * * *.

What better illustration do we want than this of the impulsiveness of his character? In his address at the victory dinner he emphasized the word "now" as the time when he wants to change the personnel of the Supreme Court, and advanced several reasons why it must be done "now", none of which was of paramount importance or interest any more than it was necessary that he enter the rear college gate "now" rather than going to the main entrance, as he should have done.

To startle the country on the 5th of February with such an announcement as was contained in his message to Congress, and within a month's time to begin talking about "now" on the most important subject that has been presented since the World War, is more than the American people ought to be called upon to stand.

PRESIDENT HAS PERSONAL GRUDGE AGAINST SUPREME COURT

Ever since the Supreme Court, by a unanimous vote, invalidated the N. R. A. the President has held a personal grudge against the Court. It will be recalled that he contemptuously referred to that decision as taking us back to the "horse and buggy" days. History will record, however, that it was this decision which started the country back to prosperity. Nevertheless, as succeeding decisions of the Court have upset the President's program, enacted with the knowledge that such parts as were invalidated were probably unconstitutional, the President has heaped abuse upon the Supreme Court and sought to discredit it in the eyes of the people.

Another decision of the Court which caused the President to take a hostile attitude toward the Court was the case in which the Court denied the right of the President to remove Mr. Humphrey as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. The only basis for the President's dismissal of Mr. Humphrey was that their minds did not "go along together" on Federal Trade Commission policies. Now, the Federal Trade Commission was established by Congress as an independent, quasi-legislative arm of the Government. In this case the Court properly held that the President could not dismiss a Commissioner except for cause. This was an instance in which the President sought to pack the Federal Trade Commission by the appointment of a member whose views coincided with his own. When the Court denied him this power, which the Congress never intended he should have, he became incensed, and from that time on the courts have been the object of his wrath. In his anger he appears to have lost all sense of restraint.

PRESIDENT PEEVED BECAUSE HE HAS HAD NO OPPORTUNITY TO MAKE APPOINTMENTS TO COURT

In his fireside chat he complained that he had not had an opportunity to name a single member to the Court, whereas his immediate predecessors all had such opportunity, varying from five Justices in the case of Taft to one in the case of Coolidge. He appeared to be somewhat peeved because former Presidents had had opportunities along this line which had been denied him simply because no member of the Court had conveniently died or resigned.

The particular objects of the President's ire are the four conservative Justices. These are Mr. Justice Van Devanter, who is 77; Mr. Justice McReynolds, who is 75; Mr. Justice Sutherland, who is 74; and Mr. Justice Butler, who is 71. But the President not only contemplates appointing one additional Justice for each of these men, but also for the other two members of the Court who are over 70—Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, who is 74, and Mr. Justice Brandeis, who is 80.

A certain amount of embarrassment will exist in both branches of Congress if members are forced to vote for the President's proposal, in that they will, by their votes, practically admit that they should be retired by their constituents if 70 is to be the age limit for public service.

I for one do not agree to vote on that basis.

PACKING OF COURT WOULD NOT BRING ABOUT REVERSAL OF N. R. A. DECISION

Although the President was considerably piqued by the Supreme Court's decision in the N. R. A. case, it is to be noted that even the so-called liberal Justices joined in holding the act unconstitutional. Thus it would not avail the President anything, so far as the N. R. A. is concerned, to pack the Court with six judges who could be depended upon to uphold its validity. These six "yes men" would still be out-voted by the nine incumbent members whom the President is unable to control. The present members of the Court, while they may not always be unanimous in their opinions, at least preserve and maintain the traditional independence of the judiciary which the founding fathers sought to make possible.

PRESIDENT SILENT ON COURT DURING ELECTION CAMPAIGN

Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that the President withheld his proposal from the people until he had been elected for another 4-year term. He purposely made no mention of the proposal during the campaign because he was afraid of the consequences. He did not confide in the people what he had in mind. Instead, he pursued the course of the artful dodger, avoiding any clear-cut definition of purpose, well knowing what he proposed doing once the people has again reposed their trust in him.

It is true that there is nothing unconstitutional about increasing the size of the court. But the motive behind the President's scheme, that is, to secure a court which is subservient to the President's will, violates and profanes the fundamental principles upon which our whole governmental system is based. The separation of the powers of Government among the three independent yet coordinate branches—the legislative, executive, and judiciary—is the very keystone of the American system. The people, in whom all power lies, have never changed that system. I do not believe they will permit the President to change that system by usurpation.

LORD BRYCE FORETOLD POSSIBILITY OF PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL 50 YEARS AGO

Mr. Speaker, one of the most noted writers on our American democracy was a noted British economist, Lord Bryce. Fifty years ago, in his book entitled "The American Commonwealth", he pointed out that under our system of Government, the very constitutional crisis which has arisen today by reason of the President's proposal might some day occur. Of course, the people at that time did not take his suggestion very seriously, and I might add that up until the 5th day of February 1937, no one took it very seriously. Here is what Mr. Bryce said:

> Suppose a Congress and the President bent on doing something which the Supreme Court deems contrary to the Constitution. They pass a statute. A case arises under it. The Court on the hearing of the case unanimously declares the statute to be null, as beyond the powers of Congress.
> Congress forthwith passes and the President signs another statute more than doubling the number of Justices. The President appoints to the new justiceships men who are pledged to hold the former statute constitutional. The Senate confirms his appointments. Another case raising the validity of the disputed statute is brought up to the Court. The new Justices out-vote the old ones, the statute is held valid; the security provided for the protection of the Constitution is gone like a morning mist.

Then Mr. Bryce goes on to say:

What prevents such assaults on the fundamental law, assaults which, however immoral in substance, would be perfectly legal in form?

Not the mechanism of government, for all its checks have been evaded. Not the conscience of the legislature and the President for heated combatants seldom shrink from justifying the means by the end. Nothing but the fear of the people, whose broad good sense and attachment to the great principles of the Constitution may generally be relied on to condemn such a perversion of its forms.

Certainly that great British writer and economist must have sensed a situation such as has arisen here now.

PRESIDENT HAS NO MANDATE FROM PEOPLE TO PACK COURT

Mr. Speaker, I think in this instance the President of the United States has overplayed his hand. He has falsely assumed that he has a mandate from the people to do as he pleases, but the people have never given him such a mandate. This matter was not an issue in the last election. In fact, the people were given to understand that such a proposal as packing the Supreme Court was one of the farthest things from the President's mind. They are resentful of the false pretense under which the President campaigned for reelection. Those who trustingly said, "It can not happen here", have found to their dismay that "it has happened here."

HISTORY OF PREVIOUS CHANGES IN COURT OFFERS NO PRECEDENTS FOR PRESENT PROPOSAL

In his message to Congress of February 5 the President attempted to justify his proposal for increasing the size of the Supreme Court by referring to the fact that the number of judges has been altered from time to time since 1789. He points out that it was originally composed of 6 members; that it was reduced to 5 in 1801; increased to 7 in 1807; increased to 9 in 1837; increased to 10 in 1863; reduced to 7 in 1866; and increased to 9, the present number, in 1869.

It has been charged that previous Presidents have tampered with the Court with a view to securing favorable decisions, but an examination of the history of the Court since 1789 shows that not one of these changes was made for the deliberate purpose of influencing the nature of the decisions to be rendered. The reduction of the Court from six to five members in 1801 never took place because the law was repealed before one of the sitting members died or resigned; nor was the Court reduced to seven members between 1866 and 1869, since only one of the sitting members died or resigned during that time, after which the size of the Court was again fixed at nine.

Histories of the Supreme Court, including those by two New Dealers—Felix Frankfurter and James M. Landis—clearly indicate that every increase made in the size of the Supreme Court from 1807 down to and including the last change in 1869, came about as a result of a distinct need for more circuit courts to take care of the increased litigation arising out of our growth as a Nation. No such need is at present shown, not even for the additional of one Justice, much less six.

Reference has been made to the change in the Court under President Grant's administration. It has been said that he "packed" the Court to secure a favorable decision in the so-called Legal Tender cases. The fact is that Congress had previously provided for the establishment of nine circuits and a Supreme Court of nine Justices, which meant the additional of one member, since there were eight members then sitting on the Court pending its reduction to seven by death or resignation. The change was to be effective in December 1869. At that time the Court was deliberating on the Legal Tender cases, and it rendered an adverse decision by a vote of 5 to 4, Justice Grier having broken a previous tie by shifting his position. On December 15, 1869, Judge Grier submitted his resignation to take effect February 1, 1870. This made two vacancies on the Court. On February 7, 1870, as the Supreme Court was announcing its adverse decision in the Legal Tender cases, President Grant sent to the Senate two nominations for the existing vacancies. It was this coincidence which gave rise to the charge that Grant was packing the Court, since on a reargument of the Legal Tender cases after the appointment of the new members the Court reversed its previous decision. As a matter of fact, however, the legislation fixing the size of the Court at nine was passed almost a year before the first Legal Tender decision was announced, and no mention was made in the debates of any attempt to pack the Court, and in truth none could have been made.

CONSTITUTION DOES NOT FIX SIZE OF SUPREME COURT

The present controversy over the Supreme Court arises because the Constitution makes no provision fixing its size. It simply says that there shall be "one Supreme Court." If the Constitution had provided for a fixed number of Justices, we would never have had in the past, and we would not have now, any controversy over "packing" the Court. No President and no Congress should ever have the power to create additional judgeships merely for the purpose of influencing the Supreme Court's decisions.

AMENDMENT FIXING SIZE WOULD AVOID POSSIBILITY OF PACKING COURT

In order that there may be an end to this controversy, and in order that the integrity of the Court may be preserved, I have introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

The Supreme Court of the United States shall consist of nine Justices, of whom one shall be designated by the President as Chief Justice.

In a recent syndicated article Mr. David Lawrence stated that as a result of an investigation he had made, he had found that in 38 of our 48 States the size of the supreme judicial body is fixed in the State constitution, with the power left in the hands of the people to change the number if and when they see fit. This is as it should be, and I personally think it would be a fine thing if a similar provision were added to the Federal Constitution.

I have preserved the present number of nine justices in my proposed amendment because that number has been found to be sufficient and to work well. A larger number would tend to become unwieldy, and a smaller number would place too much responsibility on the individual members.

In Mr. Lawrence's article he states that he telegraphed the chief justices of the various State supreme courts to obtain a symposium of views on the question of definitely fixing the size of the Court, and I would like to quote the replies of two of the judges who replied. First, I quote from Chief Justice Charles A. Goss, of the Nebraska Supreme Court:

Inasmuch as the Federal Constitution does not fix the number of Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and does not specifically grant the Congress the right to determine the number, I would favor an amendment to the Constitution fixing the number at nine.

First, because that number has been found to be adequate; and, second, because fixed determination of the number would largely remove from controversy an element that makes for political and social unrest.

I now quote from Chief Justice Folland, of the Utah Supreme Court:

The Supreme Court of the United States should be an entirely independent tribunal, not subject to influence or control by the Executive or the Congress. To attain this end, it might be better if the number of Justices were fixed by constitutional amendment rather than leaving the power with the Congress, to be used by it in such manner or at such time as to actually influence the Court decisions, or, what is as bad, to give the impression that such is the case.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of my proposed amendment as the only method by which such controversies as the present one may be averted in the future. It must be adopted if the integrity of the Supreme Court is to be preserved.

DELAYED CONSIDERATION WILL AID DEFEAT OF PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL

It is quite evident that wily tricks are being resorted to on the part of the administration to accomplish the President's purpose of packing the Court. I need not mention what these "tricks" are, as I am sure the Members on the other side of the aisle are familiar with them. All praise is due those who have courageously withstood the pressure which has been exerted. They are statesmen in the true sense of the word. They have put country above party, as every Member who is elected to Congress should.

Mr. Speaker, the press informs us that a very ardent supporter of the administration feels that the President's wishes can be realized if the question is not voted upon in the other branch until July. If this House awaits action in the other branch, it will mean a continuous session until next January.

But that is none too long, Mr. Speaker, for the people of this country to thoroughly digest and understand the implications of the President's proposal and form a considered judgment upon such a momentous question. Personally, I feel that the longer the vote is delayed, the surer the people will record their opposition to the proposal.

Speaking for myself, as one Member of the House, the summer attractiveness of the district I have the honor to represent, and the natural desire to be at home, will willingly be sacrificed if I can aid in bringing about the defeat of the President's plan. I know that in so doing, I will not only be properly representing the people of my district and my State, but will be contributing to the future welfare and stability of our beloved country. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by Maj. Gen. Edward M. Markham, Chief of Engineers, on March 12, 1937, on the subject of flood control.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PARSONS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech that I made last night at the Town Hall in New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE COMPANY STORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LUECKE] for 20 minutes.

Mr. LUECKE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I wish to digress from the normal topics of the Supreme Court, neutrality, and such weighty subjects, and talk about one which is a little closer home and perhaps not quite so heavy in thought. I consider it, nevertheless, a very important subject, a very important thing to talk about, because I believe it to be a weakening in our economic set-up.

Mr. Speaker, not so long ago in a Washington newspaper I came across this headline, "Workers Never See Cash For Years On End in Some 'Company Towns.'" That sort of aroused my curiosity and I made some investigations of my own, and it is on that subject, the "Company Store", which I wish to speak. But before I get started on this interesting subject I want to particularly give credit to Mr. Thomas L. Stokes, of the Washington Daily News, for the information which I obtained from that article. I am sure that Mr. Stokes has rendered the workers of these "company towns" a great service by disclosing some of the conditions under which they work.

At the outset I wish to say that this is not a condition which can be applied to any particular section of the country. To the contrary, it is very much a national affair. What brief material I have had the opportunity to enlighten myself on regarding this subject was taken from an investigation which covered the following States: Alabama, Arkansas, California, Florida, Idaho, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Oregon, South and North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Colorado, Illinois, New Mexico, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Utah, Virginia, Wyoming, and Georgia; in all, 27 States.

I wish to state further that this is not only a problem which is American. Company stores are found in every nation, and in England are known as "tommy shops." The American worker seems to be a little more adept at applying or coining names, and refers to them as "gyp-me stores", "pluck-me stores", "gyp joints", and "robbersaries." Now, whether or not these names apply to the case, I am unable to say. But judging from the reports that are to be had covering the "company store", it seems the worker is partially justified.

The "company store" had its origin in the early days of industry. When new territory was opened up and industry had to go into the undeveloped sections of the Nation and establish itself it was necessary to have a commissary. In fact, it was impossible to get along without one.

Now, before saying any more on this subject, I do not want to be misunderstood. There are company stores which are giving their employees the advantage of the deal. It seems that is the way it should be. A corporation working under those conditions should not take advantage of its employees and overcharge them or issue scrip upon which they must take a discount just because their employees happen to be dependent upon them for a livelihood. But good things, like everything else, come to an end and as time went on and the company became established abuses crept in. That is human nature and that is why we have a Congress of the United States to see to it that such things are regulated and the abuses abolished.

There is another phase of this problem which I wish to mention at this time and that is the issuance of company scrip. That is one of the evils which is an offspring of the company store. In some places the company issues scrip between pay days and this scrip is discounted for cash. The discount ranges all the way from 5 to 25 percent. To be more explicit, the worker takes this scrip and cashes it at the company store at a discount. There are communities in which the independent merchants cash this scrip also and, of course, make a handsome profit.

A worker who desires credit from the company store will make an application to the bookkeeper or store manager. Such advances are usually made only against wages already earned by the employee but not due him until the next pay day. The store representative usually ascertains from the operating company the amount of unassigned wages against which credit may be issued. During periods of temporary unemployment, or in case of individual emergency such as illness in the family, credit is sometimes given against future or unearned wages. But such instances are rare.

I do recall a company in Alabama which extended credit to the extent of $100,000 to its workers and received all of it back but $66. Now, that company deserves a lot of credit, and I wish to insert it at this point. I do not wish to condemn the good which can be found in the company-store system. But the fact that abuses so overwhelm the service they render prompts me in calling the attention of Congress to the company commissary.

There are many who will say, Why do not the workers trade at an independent store if they do not like the company store? That is easier said than done. The pay of these workers, mostly unskilled, is so small that it does not provide for independence, and trading at the company store is an economic necessity with them. In many cases—in most cases, I should say—after the employee has made use of the company store he is hopelessly in debt and cannot trade anywhere else.

The news report which I had the pleasure—or displeasure—to read, said this:

> I have found hundreds of men in the saw-mill industry who haven't seen any money for years.

Reading on in another report I find this choice bit of information:

> In one plant it was claimed by the laborers that there were three workers who had not received any cash in the last 15 years.

And then it goes on to say that—

> One case was encountered in which the company had not even gone through the formalities of having a cash pay day in the last 2 years.

This sort of thing is hard to believe and yet it is a part of the records, and anyone who chooses to do so can acquaint himself with the facts. It only goes to show how far abuses will go if nothing is done to put a check upon them. There have been numerous investigations and it isn't at all difficult to become informed on the subject, and why this situation was allowed to go on and on is unexplainable.

Getting back to the subject of scrip, a number of cases were found in which the operating company followed the practice of redeeming the scrip from independent stores at a discount of from 5 to 20 percent. When this practice prevails independent stores may maintain two sets of prices: One a cash price and the other a scrip price, with the former averaging from 10 to 15 percent lower than the latter. In spite of the loss involved many of the laborers prefer to discount their scrip and trade with independent stores.

I just cite that certain phase of the scrip system as very good evidence that the workers are willing to resort to anything to get away from the company store.

That the company store must be a profitable venture is made plain on the report of a certain company to a House committee in 1910. It operated company stores situated largely in the coke regions.

The dividends of this company from 1898 to 1910 amounted to $4,703,067 on a capitalization which was originally $75,000, but was increased to $500,000 without the addition of new funds. Within 12 years, therefore, these stores have paid the stockholders 62 times as much as the capitalization at the beginning of the period, without any new investment except that made out of earnings.

The company during the 52 months for which records are available paid dividends equal to slightly over 1,617 percent of its $75,000 which represents an average of 372 percent per annum. The company, with a nominal capitalization of $500,000, has paid dividends aggregating 608 percent, covering 104 months of business, which means an average per annum of 80.5 percent, or 537 percent of the original capitalization of $75,000. The accounts receivable—and this is very important in looking into this thing—amounted to only $977.98, which means that there are practically no losses through bad debts, which are a considerable item in the accounts of most retail merchants.

And while I am on the subject of losses due to bad bills, in 1931 the losses were less than 1 percent and during the depth of the depression the losses went up to 1.6 percent. The operating expenses of company stores are much less than independents—11.3 of net sales as compared with 13.1 for independent stores. From this it is plain that these stores are almost immune from losses.

There are other uses for these company-store profits. It is believed that where and when minimum wages shall be established many companies will establish company stores and in that way offset the increase in wages. In other words, the worker will foot the bill. But again that is good business. And unless something is done to prevent them nothing can stop it. Of course, that is human nature over and over again—placing the burden upon the other fellow.

Another interesting feature of the company store is a comparison of the prices with independents. It is brought out in such a comparison that the price of such foods as flour, corn meal, rice, macaroni, navy beans, sugar, coffee, rolled oats, potatoes, onions, milk, tomatoes canned, corn canned, salmon canned, peas canned, dried salt bellies, lard, fresh eggs range all the way from 10 percent to 37 percent over the independents. And with the exception of flour the purchase of these necessaries of life only amount to a very small percent of their purchases. I believe it would be fair to say that the average is about 5 percent of their purchases on these staple articles. Flour averages 28.1 percent of their purchases and the price charged is on the average 9 percent above the prices in independent stores. Potatoes come next in volume purchased and average about 8 percent of all purchases with a 10 percent higher price than independents.

These tables disclose what these workers live on, mainly flour, potatoes, corn meal, and sugar. All other purchases, such as rice, vegetables canned, bacon, ham, eggs, milk, average less than 1 percent of their purchases. Fresh meat and fruits are unheard of.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a table comparing prices in retail stores and company stores.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUECKE of Michigan. The remedy for this situation lies in a complete investigation of the company store, which is plainly a racket, with a recommendation from the investigating committee for legislation to correct such practices. It is certainly a violation of civil liberties when payment for wages is not made in legal tender or par checks. As far as I am concerned I would like to see Senator LA FOLLETTE'S committee act on this matter and I trust that that committee will interest itself in this problem. It would be a great benefit to the workers who must live under those conditions.

Another remedy would be legislation which would abolish the use of scrip. I believe many States have such legislation at this time. It would be of interest to know that the following countries have such legislation over a period of years: As far back as 1726 England legislated on this problem against the woolen industry. Germany, France, Spain, Belgium, Austria, Finland, Bulgaria, the Federated Malay States and the Straits Settlements, Oceania, French Guiana, New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian Provinces have laws curbing the company stores. Is it possible that we are more backward than they? I don't think so. And I hope that the Committee on Labor will give us a bill against the practice. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by myself today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, following the previous orders heretofore made, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, for a number of years the subject of old-age pensions has engaged the attention of thoughtful Members of Congress. They feel that with the constant change in economic conditions, which operate more and more against those past middle age, it is imperative that Congress make provision for the economic security of those no longer employable under modern standards. The first definite step in that direction was the present Social Security Act, which has now been in operation for nearly 2 years. At the time this measure was before the House I tried to point out some of its weaknesses and called particular attention to the inability of many States to carry their share of the burden. Now we can see the effect of that arrangement and we know that it is not adequate.

COUNTY PARTICIPATION UNSATISFACTORY

Time has vindicated my judgment. Our experience has proven that a pension system requiring county participation is not and cannot be successful because there is such a vast difference in the ability of the several counties to carry their share of the burden. In Minnesota we have county participation, and it is not proving satisfactory because the pensions paid under that arrangement are, in many instances, inequitable and inadequate to provide reasonable security. Any pension plan that fails to do that cannot be said to meet requirements.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S CONTRIBUTION SHOULD BE DOUBLE THAT OF STATE

Under the present Social Security Act the Federal Government matches the State contribution dollar for dollar. The law provides that the Federal Government may contribute up to $15 per month for each pensioner, providing the State meets that contribution dollar for dollar. A number of us in the House feel that the Government should contribute a greater amount than the States, also that the pension should be uniform throughout each State. This can be done only through the elimination of county participation.

PRESENT PENSION PAYMENTS INADEQUATE

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a table taken from the last annual report of the Social Security Board, which shows how the present law operates in the various States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, we find in examining this table that the State of Mississippi pays an average old-age pension of $3.59 per month. Going on to Arkansas we find they get an average of $9 per month; in Louisiana, $9.56 per month; and so on down the line. We find that California leads all the other States with the average of $31.45. The average for the entire country is $18.50. The following table gives a true picture of how the present law operates in all the States and the inequalities that now exist:

Average payment per recipient of old-age assistance for each month of the period Feb. 1 through Oct. 31, 1936, in States with plans approved by the Social Security Board and administering Federal funds (data reported by State agencies, corrected to Nov. 25, 1936), P. A. S. table 201.8

[1] Amount paid to recipients from Federal, State, and local funds, administrative expenses excluded.
[2] Includes estimates for Louisiana and Pennsylvania.
[3] Not administering old-age assistance under an approved plan this month.
[4] Federal funds available, but no payments made for direct assistance for this month.
[5] No payments for old-age assistance for July due to change in accounting procedure.
[6] Preliminary figures subject to revision.
[7] Estimated by the State.
[8] No payments for old-age assistance for October.
[9] Preliminary figures to be revised to include retroactive payments.
[10] No payments for old-age assistance for September.

From the foregoing table it will be noted that one State—Mississippi—is paying a pension of only $3.59 per month, while Oklahoma pays $8 per month. The State of Minnesota pays an average of $18.73 per month to each eligible individual, which is a trifle over the average of $18.50 for all the States reporting.

HOUSE GROUP SEEKS LIBERALIZATION OF OLD-AGE PENSION LAW

Shortly after this Congress convened a group of Members of the House associated themselves together for the purpose of working out a plan to liberalize the present law. Numerous meetings have been held at which the subject has received every possible consideration. To begin with there was considerable difference of opinion as to just what should be done and how far we could go. Every member of this group had introduced a bill to liberalize the present law and no two measures were in agreement. It was for the purpose of adjusting these differences and bringing the membership to a common ground that I called them together. As a result of our deliberations we have agreed upon a measure which provides:

First. That the Government will advance $2 for every dollar advanced by the State.

Second. That the amount advanced by the Federal Government shall not exceed $30 per month per person.

Third. That a person, upon being placed on the pension rolls, shall discontinue gainful employment.

At the present time there are approximately 7,500,000 people in the United States who are over 65 years of age. Of that number those who are in need would be eligible for pension under our plan.

PENSIONING OF AGED WOULD CREATE JOBS FOR YOUNG

The best available authorities estimate that the number unemployed in this country at the present time is between eight and nine million. A very large percentage of these unemployed are young men and women who have never had a steady job and as a result have been compelled to look to their parents for support. This is a condition that is filled with dangerous possibilities and, if not corrected, may lead to consequences now unforeseen. The solution, as we see it, is to make it possible for the aged to retire with security thereby making a place for the young who are now unemployed and want to work.

PRESENT NUMBER OF PENSIONERS IN EACH STATE

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point a table that gives the available figures as to the number of pensioners in each of the several States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DISAGREEMENT OVER METHOD OF FINANCING INCREASED PENSIONS

Mr. KNUTSON. The bill that is to be introduced will not make provision for raising the money because it was practically impossible for all our group to agree on how it should be done. Some contend for a transaction tax, others for a national lottery, while yet others advocate a material increase in income, inheritance, and gift taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include a letter at this point from a gentleman living on a farm near Eaton Rapids, Mich., which throws light on the subject of financing our plan.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EATON RAPIDS, MICH., March 8, 1937.

Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that is sent me by my Congressman I keep track of your good work, especially in pension matters, and for the farmer and laboring man, my purpose in writing you is to keep the good work up.

I know you are interested in keeping down taxes. In this connection I want to tell you how we raise money here in Michigan to pay old-age pensions. It is done through a 3-percent retail sales tax which raised $55,000,000 last year. I always opposed this tax, but now when I see how much good we do with the money I am strong for it and last fall I voted against a proposal to exempt from the tax all necessities, such as food, clothing, and medicines, and so did a big majority of the voters. We don't feel this tax any more than the gas tax. Michigan handles the old-age pension and the counties have nothing to do with it. In that way we are treated alike and that is a grand thing. Michigan pays a maximum of $30 a month for old-age pensions. We are shortly going to increase the amount and also the pensioners.

Mr. KNUTSON, why doesn't Congress put on a manufacturers' sales tax and use the money to pay old-age pensions? To my way of thinking that would raise enough money to take care of all worthy cases. I agree with you that the age limit should be lowered to 60 years. Nobody will hire people of that age. Then, too, our cripples should be taken care of regardless of age.

I hope you will overlook the length of this letter, but I am writing you in the hope it will offer some encouragement to keep up your good work for the under dog.

I have been a farmer all my life. I live on the farm my ancestors got from the Government. My people have all lived here. We are interested in the success of farming and we look upon you as one of our good friends in Congress.

More power to you.

Yours truly,

A. L. FREEMAN.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. I am rather interested, of course, in the letter the gentleman has just read because it happens to come from my district in Michigan. I happen to know Mr. Freeman, not personally, but quite well. I know he is a very substantial man and is living on the same farm that was granted to his ancestors by the Government.

Mr. KNUTSON. He so mentioned in his letter. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

PERFECTION OF PENSION LAW WILL REQUIRE TIME

I realize that we cannot hope to get a perfect law until it has been in operation for several years. Its operation will develop weaknesses which will have to be strengthened. Then, too, I am hopeful that it will be possible to lower the age limit. That will have to be done sooner or later because of the fact that modern industry either cannot or will not use men and women after they have passed middle age.

LIBERALIZATION BILL WILL BE INTRODUCED SHORTLY

Mr. Speaker, I have been prompted to make these few remarks so that the membership of the House may know that such a measure will be introduced within the next few days. I bespeak for it earnest consideration and wholehearted support. Let us not adjourn this Congress until we have provided economic security for those who are not longer employable, and as a result are in necessitous circumstances. To my mind Congress should give early attention to this most important problem. The longer we delay the more aggravated it will become.

Mr. BIGELOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

NO CHANGE IN AGE LIMIT AT PRESENT TIME

Mr. BIGELOW. I am hoping that the gentleman will inform us as to the age limit in this bill he is proposing and, may I say, if permitted to do so, that now we have arrived at a subject that is very close to my heart.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say of the gentleman from Ohio that he has been most faithful in his attendance at these meetings to which I have referred? We make no change in age limit. That must come later.

Mr. BIGELOW. What impresses me is we talk about old-age pensions, but we have not a single old-age-pension law in any State in the Union. We have nothing but outdoor relief, nothing but charity that is administered under a misnomer, old-age pension. In our State our people have to take a pauper's oath before they get anything.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that the time may come when we will recognize the right of people to have an independent income when they have retired from their labor in life and that this income may come not as a grudging gratuity but as a deferred payment of wages legitimately earned. We have in this situation the Federal Government now paying eight times as much to the people of some States as to others. There is some sentiment in favor of abolishing the State contribution altogether and making it a straight pension from the Federal Government.

As I understand the gentleman's bill, he is proposing a sort of compromise. I suppose the gentleman is proposing all he thinks this Congress will consent to and not all he wants. Personally I should like to see the age fixed at 60, but I realize that this means a 60-percent increase in expenses if the age is reduced from 65 to 60.

I should like to have the gentleman explain to us why he fixed the age at 65 in this bill, if he does, and what the limitation is on the contribution from the Federal Government under his bill. He is proposing that the Federal Government pay $2 for $1?

BILL WOULD INCREASE PENSION TO $45 PER PERSON

Mr. KNUTSON. Up to $30 a month, and assuming that each State government contributes an amount sufficient to require the Federal Government to give the maximum, that would be a pension of $45 per individual, and $90 to a married couple.

The gentleman and I have discussed this question on several occasions and I know the gentleman is in agreement with me that this is as liberal a pension law as the President would probably sign.

Mr. BIGELOW. May I say I certainly do not want to go back home and face my people without having done all that can be accomplished in this Congress to improve the situation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 7 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. May I say to the newer Members of the House that we Members who have been here for a period of years know very well the keen, active, and intelligent interest the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] has always shown in pensions not only for the needy and worthy aged citizens of this country but for the soldiers of our wars as well.

Mr. KNUTSON. I thank the gentleman.

LIBERALIZATION PLAN MUST BE REASONABLE AND INSURE PASSAGE

Mr. WOODRUFF. I believe the gentleman from Minnesota was chairman of the Pensions Committee for 10 or 12 years. During that time he certainly, on many occasions, displayed his keen interest in giving to the veterans of this country proper compensation for the injuries they received in the service of their country.

May I add just a statement in regard to the pensions for old people. Everyone who knows anything about the situation knows it is utterly foolish and unworthy of the Members of the House or the Senate to propose old-age pensions which cannot possibly be granted by the Government. To argue for something for the old people which cannot possibly be paid for is a bare-faced attempt to deceive our aged citizens. The measure of which the gentleman speaks is a compromise reached by a number of us interested in this particular subject. I believe it is fully within the power of the Government to meet the financial demands of such a bill without placing tax burdens upon our poor people impossible for them to bear. I personally am interested in the measure and trust, before the present session of Congress adjourns, we may have something of this character on the statute books.

PENSIONERS CANNOT EXIST ON PRESENT PAYMENTS

Mr. KNUTSON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. It is all the more appreciated coming from him, a veteran of two wars.

May I say to the gentleman from Michigan that by no stretch of the imagination can $3.59 a month, which is the average amount now being paid in the State of Mississippi, be considered an old-age pension. In Minnesota the average is $18.73, which is 23 cents above the average for the entire country. The Members of the House can readily appreciate how far $18 a month will go in Minnesota, especially in the wintertime, with the weather perhaps 30 or 35 below zero. I dare say the biggest part of that amount goes for the purchase of fuel, and that means very, very little left for food and clothing. As far as any luxuries or pleasures go, of course, they are absolutely denied under the restricted amount which is being paid by the several States.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

PRACTICALITY OF PROPOSED LIBERALIZATION

Mr. MICHENER. I want to commend the gentleman for the work he is doing. He is doing something which is practical. The sooner the people in the country realize this $200 a month pension as proposed by the original Townsend plan is not only unreasonable but is unworkable and unnecessary, the measure the gentleman suggests, or some more liberal one, will have some chance of consideration.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say to the gentleman from Michigan that when the Committee on Ways and Means held hearings upon the social-security bill Dr. Townsend appeared before the committee, as did his expert, Dr. R. R. Doane. Dr. Doane stated frankly to the committee, and the gentleman can read his statement in the printed hearings, that $60 a month would be the maximum that could be paid under Dr. Townsend's proposed 2-percent transaction tax. It was called to Dr. Townsend's attention that an income of something like $25,000,000,000 a year, if I recall it correctly, would be required, and I wish my colleagues would correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Something like that.

Mr. KNUTSON. It would necessitate an annual turnover of $1,200,000,000,000. In order to obtain that staggering sum, which is an astronomical figure far beyond the power of the human mind to grasp, it would be necessary to tax checking accounts, pay rolls, and everything else. Every time a dollar turned over a 2-percent tax would have to be imposed.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman means this transaction tax would cover all transactions—as set forth in those hearings—from the newsboy in the street and the woman in the country, who sells a dozen eggs, up to the man who trades in Wall Street?

Mr. KNUTSON. According to Mr. Hudson, who also testified in behalf of the Townsend plan and who at that time was very active in the Townsend movement——

Mr. MICHENER. And who said he could not vote for it.

Mr. KNUTSON. A loaf of bread would have 12 or 14 different additional taxes placed upon it from the time the wheat left the bin of the farmer until the loaf of bread went on the table of the consumer.

LETTER FROM CONGRESSMAN M'GROARTY

At this juncture I will insert a letter written to me by Congressman McGROARTY, who introduced the bill embodying the original Townsend proposal:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1936.

Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON,
Member of Congress, Wadena, Minn.

MY DEAR HAROLD: I wish to express my regret that I did not have an opportunity to see you and thank you for your cooperation during our fight for old-age-pension legislation. Let me say that you have been most helpful to us in our efforts. You helped us secure a hearing for my measure before the Ways and Means Committee, of which you are a member. You also helped draft the so-called revised McGroarty bill, and you voted to substitute the provisions of that bill for the President's old-age-pension plan. No one could have done more for the cause than you have done, and I want you to know that I shall always remember your efforts in behalf of our plan with deep appreciation.

With every good wish for your future success, believe me to be always,

Faithfully yours,

JOHN STEVEN McGROARTY.

MUST AVOID REVENUE-RAISING PLANS THAT WOULD BRING ABOUT INFLATION

It would make me most happy to see the aged and the helpless receive a pension of $200 per month, but, like Dr. Doane, I do not see how such a happy condition can be made possible unless we bring on an inflation of our money that will reduce the buying power of the dollar almost to the vanishing point. There are so many angles to this question to which the average person has given little or no consideration. There is an old Arabian saying that you can pile enough straws on a camel's back to break it. I am wondering if the American taxpayer is not carrying just about as many tax straws as he can possibly bear. Let us not forget that excessive taxation will retard recovery more than any other one thing.

When the social-security bill was before the House for consideration I voted to substitute the McGroarty bill for the old-age-pension plan contained in the security bill and at that time gave my reasons for so doing. I have repeatedly stated that I would vote for a 2-percent sales tax to finance old-age pensions, but I have never held out the hope to anyone that it would bring $200 per month. I could not, in the light of what Dr. Doane testified to when he appeared at the hearings on the social-security bill.

NEEDY AGED MUST HAVE HELP NOW

I want to give to our aged every dollar possible, but I realize that we must confine ourselves to a program that the President will approve. Our aged are interested in getting immediate results. They cannot wait for the enactment of some plan that will take years and years to put into effect if it can be at all.

In the name of these old pioneers, most of whom have reared and schooled a family and paid taxes to support the Government, I beseech each and every one of you to get behind our bill which will make their declining years free from the fear of uncertainty. Many of our aged people now find themselves in a necessitous situation through no fault of their own, but rather because of the rapidly changing economic conditions over which they have had no control, brought on by the most devastating war of all time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KNUTSON. I thank the House for its very kind attention. [Applause.]

GROVER CLEVELAND—MAN OF CHARACTER

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, it was impossible yesterday due to the vote on the neutrality bill to make proper reference to the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Grover Cleveland. Under leave to extend my remarks on this subject I wish to include a portion of an article written by Robert L. Archer under the title of "President Who Came Back."

Searching through the records, studying the newspapers of his period, weighing the words of his contemporaries, you come at last upon the secret of Grover Cleveland's greatness. The man had character.

You could not say of him, as they said of Washington, that he never told a lie. There is no picture of him trudging 7 miles in honest poverty to borrow an English grammer to prepare for a rendezvous with destiny. Their is no record that, like McKinley, he knelt on the White House floor to ask divine guidance in his hours of tribulation.

What he had that so many of his companions failed to see in him was a plain but uncommon intellectual honesty.

Grover Cleveland has the rare distinction of being three times nominated for President, nominated and elected in 1884, nominated and defeated in 1888, and nominated and elected in 1892.

His first American ancestor was Moses Cleveland who, at the age of 11, came to Massachusetts in 1635 as an indented apprentice. The first son of Moses Cleveland was named Aaron, and for 4 generations the first son bears that name, until in 1770 William Cleveland appears to break the succession. William's son, Richard Falley Cleveland, was Grover Cleveland's father, and was born at Norwich, Conn., in 1804, and in 1829 became the pastor of the First Congregational Church in Wyndham, Conn. In 1829 he married Ann Neal of Baltimore. In 1833 he was transferred to Portsmouth, Va., and 2 years later moved to Caldwell, N. J. Grover Cleveland, born in 1837, was the fifth child born to that union, and was named Stephen Grover in honor of the former pastor at Caldwell who had served that congregation for more than 50 years. Other children followed until there were 9, and the family of 11 had to exist on the meager salary received from the church, said never to have exceeded $600 per year. In 1841 the Reverend Richard accepted a call to Fayetteville, N. Y., and continued in his pastorate there for 9 years. There the young Grover received rudimentary education at the Fayetteville Academy.

Failing health and the strain of supporting so large a family on so small a salary compelled another move, and the Reverend Richard received an appointment as an agent of the American Home Missionary Society, which involved a change of residence to Clinton, N. Y. Here the young Grover was preparing for college, hoping to soon enter Hamilton College. But such was not to be, as the dire straits of the family compelled him to seek employment to help out the family purse. So he returned to Fayetteville to work in a village store for 2 years, receiving $50 for the first year and $100 for the second, with board and lodging furnished without charge. He then returned to Clinton, hoping to continue his preparation for college, but again the hand of Fate intervened by the death of his father.

After a year or two of unsatisfactory and uncertain employment, he borrowed $25 from a friend and started west. His prospective destination was Cleveland, Ohio, with the idea of becoming a lawyer. On arriving in Buffalo he called on a married aunt, who advised him to stay in Buffalo, where, in her opinion, opportunities were better. Her husband, Lewis F. Allen, was a man of means and of considerable local prominence. Young Cleveland became a member of the Allen family virtually, as Mr. Allen's private secretary. With his uncle's influence and friendship, he had no difficulty in entering the office of a reputable law firm as a student.

His independence of character was exemplified in the political campaign of 1856 when, although only 19 years of age, he chose to become a worker for the Democratic Party rather than join with his uncle, who was a prominent and enthusiastic supporter of the first Republican Party ticket.

Four years of office study prepared him for admission to the New York bar, and for 4 additional years he remained with the law firm as managing clerk. He vacated that post in 1863 to accept an appointment as assistant district attorney for Erie County. This appointment came to him without solicitation on his part and was a forerunner of conditions and situations that formed about him in future years whereby succeeding steps in the ladder of political fame were taken, not by any ambition of his, but by a combination of events and circumstances that pointed to him as the logical leader of his party. On account of the ill health of the district attorney many of the duties of the office devolved upon Mr. Cleveland. His record was such that he was nominated for district attorney, and although defeated, he received a vote much above the normal strength of his party.

His obligation to help support his mother caused him to remain out of service when Lincoln's call for troops went forth and to avail himself of his legal right to hire a substitute when drafted. Such action was the source of considerable embarassment to him in future political campaigns. The facts in the matter as stated in Mr. Cleveland's own words were:

> When the war came there were three men of fighting age in our family. We were poor and mother and sisters depended on us for support. We held a family council and decided that two of us should enlist in the United States Army and the third stay at home for the support of the family. We decided it by drawing cuts. The two long and one short pieces of paper were put by my mother in the leaves of the old family Bible. She held it while we drew. My brothers drew the long slips, and at once enlisted, and I abided by my duty to the helpless women.

He resumed his law practice, and in 1870 was nominated for sheriff. He reluctantly accepted the nomination and in a normally Republican county was elected by a majority of 100 votes. He retired at the end of his term with an augmented reputation for honesty and fearlessness. For the succeeding 8 years he returned to the practice of law. He was more and more recognized as a prominent citizen of independence, force of character, and high sense of integrity. In 1881 his party turned to him as the logical candidate for mayor of Buffalo. Again the nomination was practically forced upon him, and in his letter of acceptance occurs the famous phrase, "public officials are the trustees of the people", and from it was created the equally famous slogan of his later campaign for President, "public office is a public trust." He was elected mayor of Buffalo by the largest majority ever given a candidate for that office.

His record was such that he was just as distinctly drafted for the governorship in 1882 as he had been for offices previously held by him. The Republican Party nominated Charles J. Folger, a gentleman of high character, but there was a factional dissension in the party ranks, and when the votes were counted it was found that Grover Cleveland had received 535,000 out of a total of 915,000. The majority was much too large for a mere party victory and undoubtedly represented the determination of one faction of the Republican Party that the nominee of the other faction should not be chosen.

His record as Governor displayed the same characteristics as were shown in the offices previously held by him, viz, courage, honesty and the absence of partisan or personal designs. His career as Governor further emphasized his belief that public officials are the trustees of the people. Undoubtedly this course antagonized elements in his own party, but on the other hand it drew support from men of high purpose in the opposing party.

Then came the national conventions of 1884. Cleveland was nominated on the second ballot over the opposition of Tammany Hall, whom he had greatly antagonized during his term as Governor. The Republicans had a month or two previously nominated James G. Blaine and faced a party division, especially in New York, with the so-called "Mugwumps" led by George William Curtis and Carl Schurz. The campaign was violent, vituperative and often offensively personal. However, Mr. Cleveland did not lend himself to such methods. In fact, he tried to shield his opponent from attacks upon his personal character and private life.

At this day, 17 years after the close of the World War, one can hardly realize that Grover Cleveland came to the White House only about 19 years after the close of the War Between the States. Nor that the havoc wrought upon our country, morally, politically, financially and economically, had been much greater then than now. His party came to power after a long reign by the opposing political party, and after a period when the waving of the "bloody shirt" was a much favored political shibboleth in the prosecution of political campaigns. However, the North had become somewhat disapproving of some of the reconstruction policies of the Republicans and that party was divided by factional strife. With the nomination of Cleveland the hour had struck for the division of the northern vote and the consequent election of a Democrat as President, the first Democrat to occupy the White House in 24 years. The vote was exceedingly close, and it was not until 10 days after the election that the choice of Cleveland as President was finally conceded. He carried New York by only 1,047 votes, and the Nation by only 23,000 out of 9,700,000 votes cast.

His administration had hardly gotten under way when he met with difficulties. He had a Republican Senate to contend with, and his pledges of civil-service reform which had brought him the support of the "Mugwumps" did not at all coincide with the ideas of many of the leaders of the Democratic Party. Office seekers by thousands with their friends and advocates made his life miserable. Andrew Jackson was the first President who frankly divided the spoils of victory among his supporters, and the precedent then established had been followed by each successive President no matter to what party he belonged. Mr. Cleveland did not believe himself to be a civil-service reformer with Democratic leanings, but rather a President of the United States who believed in the principles of civil-service reform. In carrying on with these convictions he found himself in conflict not only with many of the leaders of his own party but also with the leaders of the reform movement such as Carl Schurz and George William Curtis. Nothing that he did was pleasing to both. Nevertheless he pursued the even tenor of his way, believing that the chief object of civil-service reform was to supply a list of competent persons, tested by examination, from which appointments could be made.

Outside of the civil-service list there were about 49,000 fourth-class postmasters subject to appointment by the President, and about 5,000 miscellaneous positions, mostly held by Republicans, and for each of these there were one or more expectant Democrats bringing to bear all the pressure and influence they could to fill vacancies or to make vacancies where none existed. By refusing to go to one extreme with the spoilsmen he lost their support, and by refusing to go to the other extreme with the reformers he lost their confidence. During his first summer in the White House he wrote to a friend, "All the time, like a nightmare, this dreadful, damnable office-seeking hangs over me and surrounds me."

There were other difficulties and annoyances confronting him, and to Mr. Cleveland's forthright mind these seemed to present a question that demanded a show-down. Under our Constitution the President is given the power to make appointments to office, but in certain cases these appointments must be made "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Thus it has come about that appointments to many posts of importance are made by the recommendations and influence of the Senators, even over the judgment of the Executive. The so-called senatorial courtesy of that body makes it easily possible for Members to combine and thwart appointment of any person who for any reason is objectionable to any Senator. Then, too, at this time the Senate had a Republican majority, and was inclined to make things as difficult for the President as possible. The Senate now attempted to extend its power to include its advice and consent for the removal of persons from office and asserted its right to require the Attorney General to produce all papers and correspondence dealing with the removal of an officeholder. President Cleveland stoutly defended his constitutional prerogatives and declared that the scores of demands sent to the different departments—

Have but one complexion. They assume the right of the Senate to sit in judgment upon the exercise of my exclusive discretion and executive function, for which I am solely responsible to the people. * * * My oath to support and defend the Constitution, my duty to the people who have chosen me to execute the powers of their great office and not to relinquish them, and my duty to the Chief Magistracy, which I must preserve unimpaired in all its dignity and vigor, compel me to refuse compliance. * * *

This message reiterates President Cleveland's faith in the division of powers provided for in the Constitution, and his belief that the encroachment of any one department of government upon another would finally result in confusion. It is certain he could never be charged with encroaching upon the powers of either the legislative or judicial departments, and it is equally certain that he would not permit encroachment upon his executive functions. The contentions of the Senate along this line finally subsided.

Although Mr. Cleveland had won his fight for independence of the Executive he now abandoned all thought of "independence" along other lines by taking to himself a wife in the person of the daughter of his former law partner, the beautiful Frances Folsom. They were married in the Blue Room of the White House on June 2, 1886. They repaired for their honeymoon to Deer Park, Md., and were there subjected to the painful sensation of having their every action exploited by the press to an eager and interested public. They were literally besieged by reporters whose activities finally brought this scathing denunciation from Mr. Cleveland:

They have used the enormous power of the modern newspaper to perpetuate and disseminate a colossal impertinence, and have done it not as professional gossips and tattlers, but as the guides and instructors of the public in conduct and morals. And they have done it, not to a private citizen, but to the President of the United States, thereby lifting their offense into the gaze of the whole world and doing their utmost to make American journalism contemptible in the estimation of people of good breeding everywhere.

Hon. Chauncey Depew, writing to Dan Lamont, said:

My only regret about it is that it will be so much harder for us to win against both Mr. and Mrs. Cleveland.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting at this time that we should hear something more about the great Democrat, Grover Cleveland, whose birthday occurred yesterday. I listened with more than usual pleasure to the gentleman from New York, but I failed to hear him draw the obvious lesson from the life of this great Democrat and this great President which would be very, very useful to us if followed today.

No one questions at this time, and few did when he was alive, either the purpose, the ability, or the courage of Grover Cleveland. We recall that when the Pullman strike was on in Chicago in 1894 Grover Cleveland remembered that words were not enough, that some action was required on the part of the man who had authority, and he remembered the statement he had made, and just quoted by the gentleman from New York, that public office is a public trust. He remembered that he had taken the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States. He remembered that as the Chief Executive of this Nation it was his duty to the people to enforce the law of the country. He undoubtedly believed that one of the things which should be preserved to the average citizen was his liberty, his property, his right to work, and, as I am sure you recall, he sent Federal troops to Chicago to see that the laws were obeyed and the liberties of the citizens preserved. He restored order in that locality.

For they have sown wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind.

Long, long years ago, long before the "horse and buggy" days, these words were written. Despite their age, true they remain, in your time and in mine.

Acting at the request of the President, Governor Murphy ignored this law of nature, this admonition of the prophet. When armed strikers from other cities and other States marched into Michigan and the city of Flint and took possession, in utter disregard of right and justice, to say nothing of law, of the property of the motor-car manufacturers and of the jobs of the workers of Flint, he called upon the armed forces of the State to protect these kidnapers of our factories from the wrath and the vengeance of those citizens of Flint, who, prior to the arrival of the strikers, held jobs in the city of Flint and earned for themselves and their families a livelihood.

Governor Murphy defied the mandates of the court; he stood openly behind the violators of the State statutes; he gave his approval by word and by act to those who were beyond the law—all this under the guise that he desired to prevent bloodshed.

By throwing the weight of his office in the scales of justice and so overbalancing the demand for observance of the laws we had and the enforcement of those rights which everyone concedes must be observed, if liberty is to endure, the President of these United States, acting through his Secretary of Labor and through the Governor of the State of Michigan, whom he selected, sowed the wind. He sowed the seeds of armed rebellion and of anarchy. We "shall reap the whirlwind."

All over this land of ours, those who would rule by force found encouragement and, the seeds so sown on the productive soil of unrest, well prepared by the President's long course of preaching discontent, class hatred, brought forth a hundredfold.

At present our President is on a vacation. There are other executive officers, however, and the difference between the Executive now in charge and Grover Cleveland is so apparent that we can only wish we had a little of the old-fashioned brand of democracy.

I noticed in the papers the other day that the President had a sty on his eye. His every act, his every doing, is recorded in the newspapers. He is a loquacious gentleman and has a word for every occasion. I wish he would read the papers a little more and discover that we have an armed rebellion in Michigan. Ordinarily the President can find words to express his views. I wish he would call the attention of Mme. Perkins and the Governor of the State of Michigan to the fact that we have that armed rebellion there, and that it is the duty of the State executive officers to enforce the laws of our State. I wish the President would remember that as the head of our Nation, having told us he would preserve to us the rights guaranteed under the Constitution, he would take a little action in accordance with the resolution offered by me here more than a month ago; in fact, on February 9.

About all the President's representative in Michigan—and I refer to Governor Murphy—has done, has been to hold conferences. He calls one conference after another, day after day. What is the purpose, what is the object? He said his purpose was to prevent bloodshed. That is a laudable purpose, and we all agree with him that if possible bloodshed should be prevented.

When those strikers took possession at Flint, the courts ordered them out and the sheriff was ready to put them out. The workers who had been dispossessed of their jobs were willing to undertake the job of putting them out. The city manager of Flint was ready to throw them out, and so too, was the police force in the city of Flint. Why didn't they do it? Less than 10 percent at that time were members of the C. I. O., but the C. I. O. had contributed this half million dollars to the campaign to reelect the President, and so of course there was that political debt, which must be paid, and it was paid. It was paid by Governor Murphy when he said to the sheriff, "Withhold your hand, let the enforcement of the law be suspended for a time."

Why was the enforcement of the law suspended? The Governor prevented the enforcement of the law, thus giving opportunity to the organizers of the C. I. O. to force into the ranks of that union the men in the factories who were not members and who did not desire to join. It was suspended until the factory owners, intimidated, yielded to this gospel of fear which the President and the administration are preaching, fear of what the administration, the United States Government, the Federal authority, might do to these factory owners and factory operators, to whom the President has been pleased to refer as "economic royalists."

At a recent dinner, Postmaster General James Farley said there would be no reprisals. Industry is learning that the era of good feeling has passed and that revenge now has its sway.

The whip is being cracked, and with a vengeance, not over, but on, the backs of industry, while political supporters are rewarded, in this instance, by Mme. Perkins, who, if they balk, calls them to another "conference"—the third degree under another name.

You all recall that General Motors said that they would not negotiate until these men went out of the factories. They did negotiate, and they negotiated because they were afraid of "the big stick."

Why did they recede from that stand? Because they knew that until they did, until they surrendered, the possession of their factories would be withheld from them—those factories which one of the Senators said the other day had been kidnaped and held for ransom. They did in the end yield. They yielded because of the pressure brought to bear upon them through Governor Murphy and Mme. Perkins by the President of the United States.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is it a fact that the Secretary of Labor has indicated that she thinks this procedure is possibly legal and proper?

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is the substance of her statement.

Mr. BREWSTER. If that procedure is legal and proper for them to take possession, then would it not be equally legal for the home owners in Maine who are being dispossessed by this Government to ask that they be permitted to carry on a sit-down strike and stay in their homes, instead of being ejected in the middle of a Maine winter.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The question, of course, answers itself. On the same theory the home owners would retain possession, but such theory would be accepted by no one, unless his ideas are similar to those of Mme. Perkins.

Mr. BREWSTER. And would not that also apply to the 166,000 home owners who are to be thrown out of their homes by the United States Government?

Mr. HOFFMAN. If there are that many it would apply to everybody alike.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is the number they estimate they are going to put out of their homes in the next year.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. BRADLEY. Speaking of the General Motors, is the gentleman in a position to inform the House of anything in connection with the financial structure of the General Motors, and the percentage of profits they have been paying?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I regret that I am not, and the question is of no importance in this discussion. If General Motors owns the property they are in possession of, is it not right that they should have it, if they acquired it honestly?

Mr. BRADLEY. It may be very important.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. BEITER. Along those lines, has the gentleman any information as to how much the General Motors has paid to detective agencies to spy on the workers working in those plants?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No, I have not, but I cannot see how that question is pertinent to this discussion either. If some one intends to disrupt the business, has not the employer the right to learn about it? Do not misunderstand me. I am not defending any of those practices of the General Motors. I am not saying that the men received sufficient wages, and I am not saying they were not required to work too many hours, or that the speed-up was not too great.

The proposition that I make is this, that if a man owns a coat and has possession of it, what right has someone else to take it away from him? If you put your garment down in a restaurant and I come along and take it away, does it make any difference how much you paid for it or how you got the money to pay for it? Is it yours? Are you to be protected in your right to keep it and wear it? That is the question.

Mr. BEITER. Would the gentleman suggest sending sheriffs in there and probably cause bloodshed and riots?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will answer that. The object of the Governor, as he stated, was to prevent bloodshed. Did he do it? At Flint he did. At what cost? At the setting aside of the law. When you set aside legal processes, when you take away from a man the protection of the law, you do not prevent bloodshed. You just permit the man who has less respect for the law than you have to come in and take away your property. You might just as well say that the people of France and Belgium, when Germany started to march across their land and take away their homes, should have remained quietly at home to prevent bloodshed. There would be just as much sense in that. Why not? Did those men at Flint have a right to work? You say the sit-down strikers had a right to their jobs and therefore they had a right to close the factory to men who wanted to work. Did they have a right to take away his job? Because "B" does not want to work, must all the rest of the alphabet remain at home? What a proposition that is!

Mr. BEITER. I am not in sympathy with the sit-down strikers, but I do believe that the Governor acted in good faith when he tried to get the various factions together and tried to avoid bloodshed. He did successfully avoid bloodshed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Did he? What about conditions in Detroit today? Did he avoid bloodshed? You might say that as a direct result of that C. I. O. victory at Flint the strikers went down to Anderson, Ind. They went down by the hundred. They went armed. Some of them broke into a restaurant, and two loads of buckshot from a private citizen stopped that matter down there, did it not? The others were, by the orders of the Governor of that State, turned back at the State line. Governor Townsend of Indiana performed his duty, under the constitution of his State. He enforced the laws of his State. He kept the oath which he had taken when he was inaugurated. By the firmness of his stand he saved Anderson from bloodshed and from riot.

Over at Waukegan, Ill., the strikers took possession of a factory and they held it, notwithstanding the orders of the court, until the executive officer of the county the sheriff, went in by force and threw them out.

No great moral question is ever settled until it is settled right. Some of these questions cannot be settled until blood has been shed. The question comes, whose blood is to be shed; whether that of the honest, home-loving citizen who exercises only his legal rights, or that of the armed fellow who marches in from the outside bent on trouble and says, "I will do this and you shall not do that." Just whose blood shall be shed?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Does not the gentleman from Michigan agree with me that to temporize with plain armed rebellion is to invite bloodshed, not to stop it?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Certainly. The facts demonstrate that beyond any question.

What is it that these gentlemen are trying to accomplish? What is it that John L. Lewis, the C. I. O., Governor Murphy, and the President are trying to bring about?

Who is the political boss of this country? I know that the President, when he is not on a vacation, when he is in the White House, is the boss of Congress, all right enough, but when it comes to labor disputes, where does he get his orders? He gets them from Lewis, and he gets them in language that the man on the street can understand.

At the beginning of the strikes in the motor industry, Lewis, in substance, told him that labor had contributed to his campaign, that labor had elected him, that General Motors and others had fought him, and that C. I. O. and its affiliates expected the President to stand by them in their fight with industry.

When the question as to whether the law should be enforced arose, when the courts of Michigan had decreed their enforcement, when the sheriff of a county of that State was ready to enforce the laws, Murphy, who the press tells us, was in communication with the President and with Mme. Perkins, halted their enforcement.

Go back now for a moment, if you will. In a preceding session of Congress, when the enactment of certain coal legislation was desired, Lewis threatened to call a strike if those bills were not enacted into law. The doctrine of fear was used and Congress acted. The same methods are being employed today.

The other day a distinguished gentleman, who is a personal friend of the President, who is a leader in the Democratic Party, made the statement that nothing could be done about this situation until the Supreme Court decided upon the constitutionality of the Wagner law. Neither the Governor of the State of Michigan nor the administration needs a decision by the Supreme Court, or any other court, to give it the law of the case in Michigan. The law, the justice of that law, is undisputed.

That statement in reference to the Supreme Court by the distinguished gentleman and leader in the Democratic Party was a sly thrust at the Supreme Court.

Was that statement an intimation to John Lewis and the C. I. O. to continue their organization schemes, to take possession of more factories, more businesses, and of stores? Was that a further application of the doctrine of fear?

There is an editorial writer on the Washington News who has never been classed as a conservative. What does he report on the situation in Detroit?

In his editorial of March 17, writing from Detroit, he made the statement, in substance, that all over the city of Detroit there were "islands of anarchy". What does that mean?

It means that the cause of this disorder, these present strikes in the Chrysler plants at Detroit, can be traced back directly to the sowing of the seed of nonenforcement of the law by our Governor at Flint.

It means that Bainbridge Colby, Wilson's Secretary of State, had vision and understanding when he said in 1934, referring to some of these "new dealers", that they were interested in producing "a better psychological background for the prosecution of their revolutionary" schemes more than they were interested in promoting an economic recovery.

It means that the prophecy made by Ex-Senator Reed, of Missouri, on September 17, 1934, when he said, "No longer shall any man be the proprietor of the business his genius and toil created," has come true.

It means that, unless the strong arm of the law is interposed between these men who are using organized industry for their own purposes, in an unlawful, unjust, and overbearing manner, and the property owner and the laborer who desires to work, we shall have civil strife.

All these disputes between labor and industry should be settled by arbitration. If we lack legislation, we can enact it, but, in the meantime, the security of the worker and of the citizen must be preserved.

It is evident that the present situation has gone beyond the control of those labor leaders who have the real interest of their organization members at heart. There has, in the past, been much complaint, and justly so, of armed and organized strikebreakers. Today, there is reason to complain of nonresident, organized, armed strike creators—men who march in from other localities for the sole purpose of taking possession of places of business until demands made by them are granted. Governor Murphy yesterday described the actions of some of these men as "banditry." The little kitten coddled by the Governor is now a full-grown tiger.

Neither the Governor of the State nor the President is performing his duty to enforce the law, to protect the citizen, either in his right of property or his personal right to work.

In this country, as in all others where open violation of the law has been countenanced by those charged with its enforcement, we shall have continued violence, and civil strife between warring groups will be ended, not by the application of legal remedies, but by the force of arms.

Do our executive officers intend to permit these sit-down strikes to continue until the situation calls for a dictator? Answer that question for yourselves in the light of the facts. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly interested a few moments ago when the gentleman from Ohio was speaking, but I am afraid he made a misstatement. He said there was not in operation anywhere in the country an old-age-pension law. At least this was the substance of his statement. Let us look into the subject a little. Back in 1931, in Pennsylvania, Governor Wolf was defeated for the governorship because he stood for free public schools. The charge was made that Pennsylvanians were opposed to education. They were mistaken, as the gentleman from Ohio is in regard to the old-age-pension law. Those men who opposed Governor Wolf compelled Thad Stevens to jump out the window of the House of Representatives because he was for free schools. They were not opposed to education, but they had not reached that point of great benevolence and understanding of what the economy of the country would develop into to help educate the other fellow's children. They were for education, and they paid for it. In all the valleys of the State you can see what is left of old academies which were supported by men of means and to which they sent their children to be educated. They believed in education. Now, as you know, we have free schools, just as they do everywhere else; and more of the tax money is cheerfully spent on schools than on all other activities. We have high schools which would have been classed as universities in another day.

Old-age pension is not a new birth at all for this administration or for any recent administration. It was born right here on the floor of this House in 1915 when General Sherwood of Ohio and myself had repeated conferences. General Sherwood was a most scholarly gentleman, not only a soldier, but a statesman; and when he left here he said to me that he hoped I would follow up this old-age-pension idea for he considered it the greatest humanitarianism ever conceived.

I feel that the reason we do not have a perfectly working old-age-pension system in every State is due, as was the slow progress of free education in Pennsylvania, to so many interferences.

Following our conversations on the subject I introduced a bill providing for old-age pensions, making the age 65. That was in 1915. The next year I delivered a speech on it. It is a matter of record. But we were in the midst of the war or just about to enter the war then. The war had the world aflame and there was no chance for us to do any such extensive or heroic thing as to establish a general old-age-pension law in the various States of the country. We had no old-age-pension law in Pennsylvania at that time, but there is one working now, and the idea is accepted as a principle. Throughout the ages comfort and rest for the old has been earnestly sought. I feel that we are now approaching the time when we can be content under the assurance that poverty must abdicate.

I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Bradley, who propounded the question about the profits made by corporations, that it is absurd for us to talk about people perpetuating their wealth through inheritance. I went to the trouble to make a research for nearly 2 years in the Library and with the aid of their assistants, that I might lay before this House definite, positive knowledge that a fortune cannot be followed beyond the third generation. With the taxing power in the hands of the masses, although they may not be using it right in all cases, what complaint can there be against a rich corporation? If it is too rich everybody knows the remedy. I do not say that the taxing remedy should be applied so drastically as to drive the corporations out of this country, to send them to England or some other place; it should not be so drastic as to take away incentive, for that is a fundamental and basic principle in our industrial system in America—incentive for advancement, the opportunity to get somewhere.

I should like to have entered this debate a little more extensively during the past 2 months. In my opinion, what has been said here by men on both sides of the issue, instead of disrupting the country and shaking the rock of our Constitution, has given us better anchorage than we ever had.

Now, I am going to appeal to your pride for a little bit, you gentlemen from the South, you gentlemen from the North, and you gentlemen from the West, to see if we are doing what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] said, that we are to do what our fathers told us to do. We are to do it here and we are to do it ourselves. I hope that when I shall have finished what I have to say in the few minutes at my disposal you will at least feel that there has been an utter absence of any partisanship in my remarks. During these debates I received more inspiration, more knowledge, and more hope from the very things that were said for and against the subject than I have drawn from any other source. This is an intellecutal Congress but it must have courage.

There is no such thing as a break in the perpetuation of human rights, particularly those that rest upon our Constitution.

The one thing that calls for a real answer from my Democratic friends is to tell the world why this country with tons of gold piled away, and exhaustless credit, with power of absolutism in the hands of the President, and all the operating money he can spend, with every nation in our debt, and yet in the one great overwhelming object and purpose which must be accomplished by someone, you have utterly failed to materially reduce the number of unemployed, and until you do that your administration must be regarded as falling far below your platform pledges, in fact is a failure.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. If the gentleman does not take too much time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appreciate that. I wonder if the gentleman might offer some solution with reference to putting these people to work?

Mr. FOCHT. When I get through I think the gentleman will have that information.

Mr. HOUSTON. They are going to work Monday morning?

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, this fact, coupled with the reduction of the national debt from 26 billions to 16 billions, under the Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, and which has since been increased to 40 billions, and daily mounting, leaves plenty for the President to answer in his speeches on the radio in his campaign against the Supreme Court.

Two things shine full and fair in the face of the ablest and boldest Democrat on this floor: One is the fact you have ignored your party platform pledges, and the other that you are hunting over the earth in an effort to trade away the best market in the world for the cheapest market, and instead of taking care of American workmen you are doing your best to provide employment for the farmers and workers of Canada and Europe and Asia, and with more strikes and labor disturbances than were ever before known on this continent.

That is shown by the increase in the imports and the decrease in exports, but even though we might send out more than we receive, the difference in the cost of producing commodities at home and abroad in the final analysis leaves the balance against the United States.

One remarkable coincidence of this program of paper collar reciprocity is that it is much akin to the economic theories of Karl Marx, Rousseau, Voltaire, Owen, St. Simon, La Salle, and other Socialists, who believed in a universal exchange basis of trade throughout the world, and also an international standard of wages paid labor. And if the Karl Marx theorists were permitted to apply such program, what a fine situation American labor would be in trying to compete with the cheap labor of Europe and Asia.

In the story of this question of tariff and protection, I was for a long time perplexed over the attitude of some Democrats who are insistent that we so shape our duties of entry that we may be able to buy more cheaply, never seeming to be concerned about what the workers here are to get by way of wages.

We read about the first law enacted after Washington was inaugurated being a protective tariff act, proposed by Alexander Hamilton; in the messages and papers of the Presidents I found Jefferson and Jackson to have been for protection, while the greatest tariff law ever enacted was signed by a truly great Democrat—one who had been United States Senator, Minister to England, and President—James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania.

Article 1, section 1, of the Texas Republic Constitution adopted March 17, 1836, says:

> The powers of this government shall be divided into three departments, viz, legislative, executive, and judicial, which shall remain forever separate and distinct.

The Confederate Constitution, section VIII, article 1, unanimously adopted March 11, 1861, says:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for revenue necessary to pay the debts and provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the Treasury; nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry; and all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the Confederate States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, in the last message of President Buchanan, on December 3, 1860, he made reference to the impending National crisis as follows:

> Sooner or later the bonds of such a Union must be severed. It is my conviction that this fatal period has not yet arrived; and my prayer to God is that He would preserve the Constitution and the Union throughout all generations.

And from the farewell address of George Washington I quote the following:

> The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutional government, but the Constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all.

I will grant you that had the Confederacy been successful the program would have been all right, for then the South could have exchanged with Europe, and even the North, her raw materials for manufactured goods. But it is not sound now and never can be with the development of the South with the mountains there ribbed with iron and coal and plenty of limestone, a monopoly on cotton and all kinds of fruits and vegetables, and better transportation than there is anywhere in the country.

Nearly every speaker who discussed the reciprocity question during past weeks seemed to find safety in the shadow of Secretary Cordell Hull. What they said about him personally goes with me 100 percent, but the declaration that went on here about Secretary Hull's tariff views is all wrong. Cordell Hull is not a free trader nor a near-free trader, but is out to admit foreign goods to the point of overflowing in order to rake in duties at the ports of entry, and under this system the American worker and businessman will be left to find a job or any profit in doing business.

Thus we see the futility of chasing over the world to find a cheap market in which to sell the 7 to 10 percent of surpluses which is all we have in normal times, and give at reduced tariff rates a market many times as great as what we get in agricultural and other products.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. A while ago the gentleman made reference to his experience with some legislation in regard to old-age pensions and to a bill that he introduced in this House some time back. I am curious to know something of the evolution of the thought in regard to old-age pensions then as compared with now, and how did the gentleman propose to raise the revenue with which to pay those pensions at the time he introduced the bill?

Mr. FOCHT. They were probably to be paid directly by the Government.

Mr. MASSINGALE. How would the Government get the money?

Mr. FOCHT. I would have to refer the gentleman to the methods the Government has of getting money today. That question has been propounded here from time to time. There are no difficulties in connection with getting money in a country that is the richest in the world. There is no trouble about our finances now and there never will be.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am sure there is no difference between the gentleman and myself in regard to our thoughts in reference to paying old-age pensions; but I was curious to know how the gentleman provided for getting the money, because we have had transaction taxes and manufacturers' taxes and things of that sort proposed here, and I wanted information.

Mr. FOCHT. May I say to the gentleman what we were struggling to do at that time, General Sherwood and a few of us, was to establish the principle first, feeling there was an obligation resting upon every living human being to help take care of the aged, and particularly after that period arrived when we refuse to give men work when they are past 45 or 50 years of age. What are you going to do with them? Send them over the hill to the poorhouse? The system would never have been such an involved one as is the case with the Townsend proposition. How are you going to apply a law like that which levies a tax every time there is a transaction?

Mr. MASSINGALE. That is the reason I asked the gentleman the question. I am in thorough sympathy with the old-age-pension proposition.

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly the gentleman is. You can wipe away the tears from the old people. It is all over. We are going through with it. It is the biggest thing the President ever did, and it did more than anything else to elect him President of the United States, yet some of our leaders have not been able to see that yet.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am in accord with the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. I feel very serious about this, because I tried to put it through the Pennsylvania Legislature, and I was turned down by the chairman of a Republican committee, who could not see the light, but party defeat came as the penalty.

Mr. MASSINGALE. One more question about evolution, and I will not bother the gentleman any more.

Mr. FOCHT. I believe in it thoroughly, if it means moral and spiritual progress.

Mr. MASSINGALE. So do I. Aside from the question of raising revenue with which to pay these people, what did the gentleman's bill do about such things as age, and whether or not the Federal Government would assume the liability, or would it be distributed as it is now among the States.

Mr. FOCHT. Our thought, as far as it went, was that the Government should take hold of the matter. At the present time you are investigating it. You are going to see more about the proposition, but finally we are going to put it into complete action. All the varying phrases could not be seen at the beginning, but it is all clear now, and we are finding a way.

No; Cordell Hull does not desire the kind of trade I have heard people refer to here. The kind of trade he talked to me about when he was developing his program on income taxation is not this kind of flexible tariff. He is not for free trade but for revenue only so that the money may flow freely into the coffers of the port of entry, with everybody buying at low prices while wages in America vanish. That is the Democratic program, and in America it is not working, and will not work, only to exhaust the reserve wealth of the country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HILL of Alabama). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman to answer another question, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not think I answered any of the gentleman's questions satisfactorily, so I do not know whether I can do any better now.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am in full accord with the gentleman's sentiment. I was really seeking information. I have been an advocate of the obligation of the Federal Government to pay pensions if pensions are to be paid, but I wanted to know just what the thought was on the day you initiated in Congress the old-age-pension idea.

Mr. FOCHT. That was General Sherwood's idea as well as mine. He was a man not only of knowledge but of wisdom. I believe General Sherwood was a Democrat, but you would not have known it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman tell us what General Sherwood's idea was?

Mr. FOCHT. Not as to a completed proposition. That would be hopeless in my brief time. There is no legislation on the statute books today of wide application but what has been amended, proving that there is no such thing as superwisdom on the part of anyone. When our laws come in contact with the laws of nature, there is an inevitable collision; and when we find errors in laws we come back here and correct them by amendments, which is what we will do with this.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman give me an outline of what the idea is?

Mr. FOCHT. I cannot go into that any more than to say that we are for relieving the people and the ultimate destruction of all the poor houses. Wipe away the tears of all the old men and women. Let them have comforts and happiness at home. There is plenty here in this world to take care of everybody. Everyone could have comfort and happiness. I repeat that poverty has abdicated.

There is no use of the gentleman and me getting into an argument or his taking my time on another subject now. It is all over. The gentleman is coming in too late.

I heard President Wilson say from this rostrum that under the Underwood tariff we could meet and beat Europe if American labor would speed up. "Whet your wits", he said; while Representative Redfield thought there was no further need of customhouses.

Mr. KNUTSON. He was Secretary of Commerce in President Wilson's Cabinet.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; and wild for free trade.

But Samuel Gompers, the sincere and patriotic labor leader, said American labor could not compete with the wages of Europe unless we starved American labor back into the factories, which we refused to do.

We have more domestic commerce than the rest of the world combined, and that is the market for us to protect, and which must be protected if America is to ever again return to prosperity.

I venture to say that the greatest men of America, the wisest and most patriotic leaders of the North, South, East, and West, who helped make the Republic and helped preserve it, would not support the attitude of the President of the United States on this tariff question.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that under the operation of the reciprocal trade agreement law we wiped out a favorable trade balance of $235,000,000.

Mr. FOCHT. And the debt goes on increasing.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I agree with the gentleman fully on the abdication of poverty, but in the event we cannot abdicate poverty, do you not think we ought to be good sports?

Mr. FOCHT. Kill them or what? Starve them to death or what?

Mr. HOUSTON. Sure, be good sports. That is what a very distinguished gentleman said the other night. If they lose, they ought to be good sports.

Mr. FOCHT. Who lose?

Mr. HOUSTON. Anybody.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not play poker, so I do not understand what the gentleman means.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is one of the greatest of indoor sports, they tell me.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; so they tell me. I would not be here if I knew how to play it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Who would?

Mr. FOCHT. I would never have had time for anything else, because they tell me it is very fascinating.

From the Constitution adopted for the whole country to the constitution adopted by the Republic of Texas in 1836, to the Confederate Constitution in 1861, and the administration of James Buchanan, and the business interest and labor organizations on through, we have the intelligence, patriotism, and chivalry of America standing for tariff protecting industry and labor, as well as for the Constitution and the Supreme Court.

You will not deny that.

Every one of your ancestors, your fathers, from whose loins you got all this fine character and intellect, from Texas to Canada, were for these fundamental things, and we are not going to abolish them now either.

Nothing stands out in the heroism of the world in greater or more majestic figures than the men who made the constitution of the Republic of Texas as well as defended it; nor do I anticipate that there is going to come from the South any such voice of destruction, any such thing as will repudiate that for which brave men led heroic armies over many States in an effort to establish a constitution; nor are men and women anywhere who believe what the flag typifies and symbolizes going to see it profaned or taken down and laid away to accommodate the whim and caprice of a single individual who seems unmindful of the scourge his act may bring to plague and distract a people who have sacrificed beyond estimate that the heart of liberty may beat on in courage during the trials of the future.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman believe in a fair protective tariff on commodities produced in this country—not a prohibitive tariff, but a fair protective tariff?

Mr. FOCHT. I will tell the gentleman what Mr. Hull said, and this is his theory. He said, "FOCHT, there is no use of your talking about this thing of raising enough money by a tariff to run this country." We were living at the same hotel and he said, "We are right now voting $1,000,000,000 and that is what it is costing to run this country and you can only raise $600,000,000 on a balanced tariff. If you bring in too much, you flood the market and if you do not bring in quite enough, then you do not raise even the $600,000,000. We have got to raise it in some other way." Then came his brilliant conception of taxing the man who has the money. The only trouble about that is you have gone too far and you are taxing the poor devil that does not have any money, and I am one of them. I have been in the red for 4 years and they are taxing me up home with several different kinds of new State taxes every time I go home.

Mr. HOUSTON. One little tax more, would not hurt. For instance, in the importation of crude oil, we have fought for years to get a protective tariff of from 85 cents to $1 a barrel, and after all these years we finally have 21 cents. Would the gentleman be in favor of raising that to $1?

Mr. FOCHT. I would have that measured up somewhat with the consumption of oil and its cost and the need of it, and so forth. There is a way to balance that.

Mr. HOUSTON. We have plenty of oil in this country now. We are all on allowables.

Mr. FOCHT. But I will tell the gentleman what I am not in favor of. I am in favor of this Congress sitting across the table with you and having you ask the question and having it answered, but I am not in favor of this 50-percent allowance made to the President in a flexible tariff to run it up or down so that the businessman will not know how much tariff he is going to have tomorrow or how small it is going to be the next day. We must have a fixed tariff and adjust ourselves accordingly. This is a fundamental principle of the tariff.

Mr. HOUSTON. But in the case of our oil, we are under allowables now.

Mr. FOCHT. Oil is a very liquid, movable, and uncertain thing.

Mr. HOUSTON. We have from 5 to 10 percent production out there today.

Mr. FOCHT. Where?

Mr. HOUSTON. All over the Middle West, and I think we ought to have a higher tariff.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman believe in very much more tariff on gasoline when it is produced at 3½ cents a gallon and you sell it to me in Pennsylvania for 20 cents? Are you not getting your piece out of it?

Mr. HOUSTON. Not enough, and they are using it for other purposes now.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; I guess they are. [Applause.]

THE STRIKE EPIDEMIC

With better days coming out of the tall timber, and the cycle of hard business traveling having finished its evil attack upon about everyone and everything, it is not strange that thousands of workers are having a sit-down strike, or suspension of labor, until they may have their wages adjusted somewhat more in harmony with the higher cost of living and the reduced purchasing power of the dollar.

This strike business is epidemic in its scope, and goes from automobiles in Detroit to grub at the Willard and Mayflower Hotels in Washington, to the silk-mill girls of Japan, and stocking factory out on the District of Columbia line, to say nothing of what was threatened in a strike gesture toward the United States Steel and Hershey's chocolate factory.

While the workers seem in good humor over their prank of a sit-down strike, it is nevertheless expensive pastime for them as well as the employers. At that there is good cheer because of the readjustment made necessary in wages of workers on account of the depreciated dollar. In fact, we are having a very good sample of inflation, which will do no harm, providing it does not go too far and the credit of the country should crack. The Federal Reserve was supposed to be able to control the flexibility of circulation, and that will be all right as long as confidence is maintained.

The greatest fear here in Washington is over the danger of again becoming smeared in with Europe in the war preparations which are speeding up over there and the possibility of falling for the profit there will be in selling them supplies and furnishing money by detouring the Johnson law, or slipping our resources under the fence, which might be characterized, via Veracruz. Very earnest effort is being made by officials and laymen who are resolved that two things must not happen, to wit:

America must not become involved in the European war, which is now imminent.

America must not advance to European nations our reserve resources for war purposes.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet Monday noon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article prepared by Col. Frank P. Hobgood, on the Infallibility of Majority Court Decisions.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the article?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. It is an article prepared by Col. Frank P. Hobgood on the Infallibility of Majority Decisions and refers to the President's Court proposal.

Mr. KNUTSON. Who is Colonel Hobgood?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. He is an attorney at law living in Greensboro, N. C., and during the Wilson administration was special assistant to the Attorney General.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

OATH OF OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday I received a letter in the mail that came from an institution of higher learning, and just as I was about to cast the letter aside I noticed the oath that is administered to every Member of the House of Representatives. This was followed by the oath administered to the President of the United States. This attracted my attention and, reading it through, I found that this professor of economics undertook to castigate the Members of Congress and the President of the United States as violators of their oaths, holding them to be felons guilty of perjury. Included in the letter was a charge to a jury by a Federal judge, in which he invoked one of God's commandments to Moses to point out that he who would take the name of God in vain was guilty of perjury, and that perjury was worse than murder.

I felt such a keen resentment that I ascertained who this professor of economics was. He proved to be Gus W. Dyer, professor of economics at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., and in my spirit of resentment and in defense of the Members of Congress and the President of the United States, and all people who take oaths in accordance with their conscience, I felt called upon to write him a letter. I have shown this letter to some of the Members of the House who have asked me to include it in the RECORD.

My purpose in asking this time at the present moment is to include Professor Dyer's letter, my answer, and one to the chancelor of Vanderbilt University, transmitting an advance copy to the university's head for his information as well as the trustees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 11, 1937.

To the Representatives in Congress:

Since under the new order it is now considered a proper function of Congress, a subordinate agent of the Government, to change, radically, anything in the Constitution that may be displeasing to the President, another subordinate agent of the Government, I am appealing to you to support an important change that has been almost completely overlooked.

The Constitution, as you know, requires every Congressman and every other public official to take an oath to uphold the Constitution before they are permitted to perform any function of their offices. Even the clerks of Congress, the Sergeant at Arms, the doorkeepers, and the postmasters are required to take this oath.

The nature of the oath each Congressman is required to take is significant in a peculiar way at the present time. The oath is as follows:

"I do solemnly swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God."

The very words of the oath that the Chief Executive is required to take are given in the Constitution:

"I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

To claim that the subordination of one of the three coordinate departments of the Government to the other two is consistent with the above oaths is too absurd and puerile to be given consideration by intelligent people. To make such a claim is a serious reflection on the man who makes it as well as on those to whom it is addressed.

The question here involved is far more serious than any change that might be made in the Constitution. The question is, Shall public officials knowingly, openly, and defiantly violate the sanctity of an oath?

Therefore I am requesting you to introduce a bill at once to repeal the provision of the Constitution that requires public officials to take an oath, and to repeal all laws that require witnesses and jurors to take an oath in courts of justice. Of course, you have no right, under the Constitution, to introduce such a bill. But we are not operating under the Constitution now. Hence the way is open for anything. If the oath is repudiated by public officials, it is hypocritical and preposterous to make such repudiation a felony as applied to witnesses, jurors, and others.

If public officials are too weak morally to carry the obligations of an oath, the oath should be abolished and a "big stick" wielded by a strong arm be substituted in its place.

The violation of the sanctity of an oath by public officials is a deadly blow at the very foundation of civilized social order, and in addition it is flagrant insult to the Deity. The oath has been considered the supreme binding force on every man worthy to be called a man. The violation of the sanctity of an oath has been considered so antagonistic to every conception of honor and manhood that it has been made a felony by civilized governments.

That you may better understand the chaotic condition under which we find ourselves at the present time, I will call your judicial notice to a charge to a jury delivered by a distinguished Federal judge some years ago:

"Gentlemen", said the judge, "there can be no more solemn obligation (the oath). Upon the first table of the law delivered by the Almighty to Moses amidst the thunders of Sinai was inscribed the commandment, 'Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for He will not hold him guiltless who taketh His name in vain.' That commandment as interpreted by the old Jewish rabbis and the best Biblical scholars of the past and present is primarily a commandment against perjury. The reason why it, alone, of all the commandments is coupled with the declaration that the Lord will not hold him guiltless who violates it is doubtless because it is a willful insult to the Almighty to call upon Him to witness to the truth of a deliberate falsehood. Gentlemen, I think perjury is worse than murder, and that is why I call attention to the responsibility and the solemnity which rests alike upon you and upon me to do our duty."

Yours sincerely,

(Signed) GUS W. DYER.

Vanderbilt University.

MARCH 13, 1937.

GUS W. DYER,
Professor of Economics, Vanderbilt University,
Nashville, Tenn.

DEAR MR. DYER: Immediately on receipt of your mimeographed letter dated at Nashville, Tenn., March 11, 1937, I called the Honorable RICHARD M. ATKINSON, representing the district comprising Nashville, in the Congress of the United States, and learned the scope of your connection on the faculty of Vanderbilt University.

Since you are located in a district that is distinguished by having sent to the Congress of the United States as its first Representative, Andrew Jackson, I could wish no more for you than that it might have been possible for that sterling American to be here in the flesh at this time to observe the product of your institution of higher education and deal with you, its professor of economics, in keeping with his established reputation for courage.

I can scarcely find superlatives to adequately express my contempt for the opinions you express and the conclusions you have reached in the matter of the consciences within the breasts of those who are here, honored by their respective districts to represent them in the Congress of the United States, to say nothing of the greatest expression of confidence ever given any other man than bestowed by the American people upon Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President of the United States.

"Your conscience is the minister plenipotentiary of God Almighty placed within your breast. See to it that he does not negotiate in vain." So quoth John Adams.

Whatever the conscience placed within your breast, it has manifestly been warped and twisted by a bigoted judgment, highly prejudicial to the profession you follow, that of teaching others.

Your quoting of a charge to a jury by a Federal judge, embodying that commandment of God to Moses, involving the taking of His name in vain, borders on the assumption of the role of demagogue, particularly when imputing the judge's opinion, "that perjury is worse than murder", to apply it to the use of your own sinisterly prejudiced purpose of charging the President of the United States and Members of Congress with perjury in your fancied conception with breaking their oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. Your holding the legislative and executive branches to be subordinate branches of the Government, and quoting of the oath taken respectively by Members of Congress and the President of the United States, leaves but one conclusion, that by excepting the judiciary and their oath, you hold the judiciary "supreme." The legislative and executive departments are subordinate to the people alone, while the judiciary and Executive are responsible and subordinate, through impeachment, to the people, under the powers of Congress.

Ensconced as you are in smug complacency on the faculty of an institution of higher education, you assume to quote in your letter the oath taken by Members of Congress, and that set forth in the Constitution of the United States, by which oath each President of the United States has assumed the duties of his high office. Disregarding the past, you assume to say that the Members of this Congress and the President of the United States are the perjurers—worse than murderers—who are in your bigoted opinion and warped and twisted judgment the only ones to break these two forms of oath, since you impute it to no one else, but those now living whom you call upon to introduce a bill to abolish every form and purpose of an oath.

You are either too ignorant, or too lazy, or both, to know or find out that the judiciary must, too, take an oath prescribed by law and before entering upon their duties. That your energies may not be taxed to the point of exertion, or the state of your lassitude and inertia need not be disturbed, I quote you the judiciary oath from section 712, Revised Statutes of the United States, as follows:

"I, ——— ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge, and perform all the duties incumbent upon me as ————, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeable to the Constitution and laws of the United States: So help me God."

May I not commend to your thought, if you are capable of thinking at all, the words, "do equal right to the poor and to the rich", and, "I will faithfully and impartially discharge, and perform all the duties incumbent on me", and, "according to the best of my abilities and understanding", and, "agreeable to the Constitution and laws of the United States."

When a law of the United States conflicts with the sinister overprivileged interests of the rich "economic royalist", the judges call the law unconstitutional, according to their best abilities and understanding. It is then, such as you, with no regard to the impairment of abilities attendant on old age, undertake to castigate Members of Congress for passing the laws of the United States, and its President for approving them, as breakers of the respective oaths of office they have taken, and invoke one of the Ten Commandments to tell us we are worse than murderers.

Let me point out to you that Governor Hughes, now Chief Justice, once said: "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is."

Let me also tell you that the late and Honorable James M. Beck, a former Member of Congress and one-time Solicitor General of the United States, an eminent and outstanding constitutional lawyer, up to his death a year ago, in his own writings, styles the Supreme Court: "Virtually and chiefly a continuation of the Constitutional Convention of 1787."

Let me say to you that I have never found anywhere a finer and more sincerely conscientious group of men and women collected, than here in the Congress of the United States. Each is individually honest in their own convictions and the "minister plenipotentiary of God Almighty within each breast is not negotiating in vain." There are no starry-eyed idealists and wild radicals here. Such exist only in the figment of the imagination of the demagogue ever willing to appeal to and arouse the populace. The same thing, too, applies to the President of the United States. To these, each and all of these, you impute a crime worse than murder.

If the influence of your incompetent, warped, and twisted judgment is reflected in the students of the institution standing for you on its faculty, I am happy to say that "Dick" Atkinson has cast aside and left behind him the contamination of the influence of your teaching.

"Shoemaker, stick to your last." Professor, stick to your own economics if Vanderbilt University can stand for such as you, but let politics and statesmanship to men of a greater breadth of vision than that manifestly possessed by you as exampled in your contemptuous letter.

With revulsion, I am

Disgustedly yours,

GUY L. MOSER, Member of Congress.

MARCH 13, 1937.

The CHANCELOR,

Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.

MY DEAR SIR: This morning I received a mimeographed letter, similarly sent every Member of Congress I have had time to contact today. Most of them withdrew the unread insult from the wastebasket after I had directed their attention to it. This letter was dated at Nashville, March 11, 1937, and was mailed in an envelope bearing the postmark of the post office at Nashville, Tenn., 5:30 p. m., March 11, 1937.

The letter was signed by one Gus W. Dyer, Vanderbilt University. Immediately contacting Congressman ATKINSON, of Nashville, an alumnus of your university, I learned that Gus W. Dyer is the professor of economics at your institution.

His letter was most insulting, imputing to all Members of Congress that we are violators of our oaths of office as is also the President of the United States, and by the quoting of our oath as well as that of the President, he further quotes a Federal judge's charge to a jury invoking one of the commandments of God to Moses and holding perjury worse than murder, to impute to us and each one of us a felony worse than murder.

I feel no personal grievance against Vanderbilt University as a consequence of this subversive attack, unwarranted as it is, on the integrity of the President of the United States and all Members of Congress, and before taking the floor of the House to denounce this man for his impudence, causing the insertion of his letter, my response thereto and a copy of this letter, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am sending you an advance copy, in all fairness to you and your board of trustees.

Very truly yours,

GUY L. MOSER, M. C.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, we hear much reference to the teaching of subversive doctrines and principles. If a professor of economics in an institution of higher learning had the gall and effrontery to cause such letters to be sent through the mails, what can he be teaching? I leave it to the discernment of the House. Professor Dyer is also a representative of the National Association of Manufacturers, in whose cause and in whose interest he uses the radio to broadcast his ranting expletives.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, if I desire to do so, to incorporate in the RECORD my reply to Professor Dyer, who wrote me a similar letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I addressed the House on the life of Grover Cleveland. At that time I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks but I failed to ask permission at the time to include therein several small excerpts by Robert L. Archer under the title "The President Who Came Back" in connection with the life of Grover Cleveland, and I do so now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection,

There was no objection.

A DOLLAR IN THE HANDS OF SELFISH GREED AND MONEY MONOPOLY IS MORE DANGEROUS, MORE POWERFUL, THAN SHOT OR SHELL, THAN SWORD OR GUN

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of Congress, I first wish to take a few moments to pay tribute to Governor Murphy, of Michigan, prompted by the disparaging remarks recently made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], who preceded me on the floor. I believe I am just one of the many millions of citizens of the United States who honor and appreciate Governor Murphy for what he did in the settlement of the General Motors strike. I believe that I am just one of the millions that appreciate his humanitarian plan and method whereby he settled a strike when we were trembling for fear that it might lead to bloodshed and revolt.

This recent history of Michigan's honored Governor reminds me of a great citizen of France. The people called him Mirabeau the Peacemaker, and they said of him, "If only our Mirabeau could have lived, there would have been no French revolution." And I believe they were right. I believe in offering a tribute to Governor Murphy and President Roosevelt in the peaceful settlement of this threatening strike that I speak the sentiment of 80 percent of the people of our Nation.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINDERUP. Not now. I know what the gentleman wants to say. But just wait until I get through and then I will give him the privilege of saying it.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman must be very wise; I am sure he knows what I am going to say.

Mr. BINDERUP. I do know, because I have listened so much to the gentleman from Minnesota for several years, and I know what he is going to say, and I would like to answer it a little later, after I finish.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire that my subject should not be considered a political issue. I would like to refer also to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], who spoke immediately before me. He asked a very striking question, honestly and conscientiously I believe, when he called attention to the fact that we have not eliminated the poverty and misery of the United States, and asked why we had not been able as yet to bring our great Nation back to normal. I wish to give my own reasons for that. It is because we have never analyzed the case, and we have never yet discovered the cause in this Congress of this depression.

But the Republicans and the Democrats are alike to blame. I remember a few years ago when the Republicans were trying to cure this depression, and they suggested as a remedy to build prosperity from the top and down, telling us that in this way the money would dribble down to the farmers and the working people, and thus prosperity would be returned. I have often said, and I wish to repeat it once more, that you cannot build prosperity, my friends, from the top and down, any more than you can build a 10-story brick house and build the top story first. You have to build from the bottom and up. We tried it during the Republican administration. We experimented.

First we gave to Mr. Dawes' bank $90,000,000, and waited and hoped that it would dribble down. But it never dribbled. It stayed right in Mr. Dawes' bank, locked up. It never moved. Then do you remember that they gave to the Missouri Pacific Railroad millions of dollars because, we said, the money would dribble down and give work to the laboring people? But it never dribbled.

And then do you remember that J. Pierpont Morgan stepped in and said, "I'll just take that money myself"? We said, "Wait a minute, John. Now listen, you can't do that. We gave those millions of dollars to the Missouri Pacific in order to create work, in order to make the railroads safe, that the public might travel in confident safety, in order that labor might have employment. You can't take that away from us." But Mr. Morgan replied, "The bonds are due." And we said, "All right. I guess that's right, Mr. Morgan. Go ahead." And do you remember he invested this money in Europe? Again we went to Mr. Morgan and said, "Now, listen, John, you can't take our money and invest it in Europe. That money belongs down there in Missouri. That's what we gave it for. You can't take that money and send it over to Europe." Mr. Morgan replied, "Investments in Europe are safer now than they are in the United States." And again we said, "I guess that's right. Investments are not very safe here."

We did not take the trouble to stop and tell J. Pierpont Morgan who it was that had made investments unsafe over here, who it was that had taken the money away from the people and wrecked our Nation.

THE CRIME OF 1920

And now, Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of Congress, I wish to return to the subject I had intended to discuss this afternoon. There is an old, old saying that peace has its horrors as much as war, and by this I mean to refer once more to the crime of 1920, the greatest crime that was ever committed against the people. On former occasions and appearances before this House, on February 16 and March 4, and more or less at other times, I told you of this crime that was committed at 12 o'clock noon on the 18th day of May 1920 in the office of Governor Harding, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve bank, where a secret meeting was being held, consisting of 53 of the large banking representatives of the United States, international bankers and representatives of Wall Street, and also Mr. Houston, the Secretary of the Treasury, and John Skelton Williams, the Comptroller of the Currency, ex-officio member of the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve bank at that time. Since that time, however, the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury, the representatives of the people, have been removed, as they were apparently in the way of the large bankers and interfered with their program.

I have in my possession the records of the minutes of that meeting. There is no longer any question about it. It is strange to me that the people of America have not long since known exactly how it is, and why it is, that this disastrous calamity, this depression, was brought upon us. This was the twenty-fifth time that we had suffered from these depressions, all coming from the same source, all man-made. Every depression is man-made, and yet we did not understand.

Everybody said and whispered to each other, "Isn't it strange? What in the world is the matter? We seem to have too much of everything, and yet we are in want. We have too much to eat and to drink, too much of the necessities of life, too much of the luxuries, and everything, but we can't have it." Yes, my friends, we are sitting upon the largest pile of gold that has ever been accumulated in the history of the world in any nation; actually sitting upon this pile of gold, surrounded by all the natural resources that an Almighty God could give to man, in a nation with unlimited credit and unlimited wealth, and yet the farmer is losing his farm and the laboring man is losing his home. Fifteen thousand banks failed, destroyed eight billions of the people's savings. And all about us there are bankruptcies and misery and want and despair, soup kitchens, and bread lines.

And then the people of our great Nation would look at each other in surprise and say, "I can't understand it. It's the strangest thing that I ever heard of. How can it happen that we are suffering of poverty in the midst of plenty?"

My friends, believe me, there is only one reason. It is because they had that meeting on the 18th day of May 1920 in Governor Harding's office, where they took away from the people their money, the lifeblood of trade and industry and the wheels of commerce. I wish I could shout this from the mountaintop until the people of our great Nation might know and understand. I assure you that there would then be a change before morning if the people only knew.

It was Henry Ford who said, in substance, this: "It is perhaps well enough that the people of the Nation do not know or understand our banking and monetary system, for if they did I believe there would be a revolution before tomorrow morning."

I told you in my last talks the substance of the conversation that took place at this meeting, and one of the first days direct from this floor I will tell you the name of every banker who was there, representing the interests of the Morgans and the Mills and the Myerses and the Mellons and the Rockefellers and the Du Ponts and the large corporations and money monopolies.

I will tell you this emphatically and definitely, taking it from the records of that meeting. I told you that John Perrin, of California, arose and suggested that we could take away from the people two billions of their money, money that measures the sweat of the brow of man, money that measures the remuneration of labor and the products of labor, according to its own abundance, by comparison. I told you why they wanted to make money scarce, as thereby they could increase the purchasing power of interest, so it would crowd down the price level of labor and the products of labor, and so that interest could buy more, as it was a fixed charge.

I told you of the objections to this from John Skelton Williams, the Comptroller of the Currency. And let me add that there were two of the big bank representatives there who objected strenuously, also, because they thought it too drastic a measure, but they were in a vanishing minority. I told you how these bankers meant to crush down the price level. They did not mean to destroy the Government exactly. No; they rather disregarded the Government and disregarded the people. All they wanted to do was to enrich themselves.

I told you about the great inflation that we had during the war and after the war, when we were on a single gold standard that they preached so much about, that was so safe, when we had the greatest uncontrollable inflation this country has ever had, and yet, let me remind you again, on a single gold standard. And we had another cause and we still have it, that silly, strange, foolish, incompetent, childish monetary system and banking system, whereby the banker was allowed to deposit these bonds in a certain drawer in any Federal Reserve bank, draw his interest in full semiannually, and draw every dollar in cash besides, and then take these dollars and loan them 10 times to the public, each time drawing interest on every dollar, even the dollars he did not have. Such a monetary system cannot possibly mean anything but bankruptcy every few years.

Now, these bankers knew they could not change the figures on their bonds and obligations, but they knew another way. They tried 24 times before in the United States and in other nations. Every economic writer told them, "Just crush down the price level, and interest, remaining stationary, will have the purchasing power back again."

And, friends, I want to repeat once more and warn you that you cannot crush down a price level, after you have done business for a number of years on a certain price level. You bought and sold your farms and homes and your goods on the shelf. Every obligation and future contract is based on this price level. You cannot crush a price level down unless you bring in return to the people starvation and deprivation and misery and want and soup kitchens and bread lines.

But these men were not considerate of the Nation. They belonged to the class that say by their actions, "We do not care for the Almighty God. Just give us the almighty dollar. All we want is that interest must have a greater purchasing power." Let me once more repeat the words of Governor Harding. It is so striking, my friends, that I know you will welcome a repetition. Mr. Harding was the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve banks, and presided at the meeting on this, the 18th day of May 1920. Let me once more quote from the record of the meeting, as follows: First, "We must have a reduction in credit, a credit contraction" (meaning thereby taking the money out of circulation. And then he added (again quoting from the record of the meeting), "This is a drastic remedy, but we believe it is necessary."

He knew and they all knew, and we know it now, that this was a drastic remedy. He knew what it meant to crush down the price level. He said, "It is a drastic remedy, but we think it is necessary." We know that it was not necessary, except for those who wanted to enrich themselves at the expense of suffering humanity. The words I have given to you, remember, are copied from the records of the meeting.

Now, just consider what happened to the people of the United States after this meeting on the 18th day of May 1920, that I have described to you. In order to show you the direct reflex, the effects, of that meeting, let me take myself for an example, for I represent one of the 125,000,000 people that suffered thereunder. In stating my own experiences I am merely stating yours. In fact, I am just reviewing and reminding you of what took place in your own community, in your own home, and on your own farm.

I had always been a big borrower in my home bank. I was always quite a developer, doing considerable building, and employing quite a few men. One bright summer morning, in the following month of June, I came in to my banker as usual, to renew my note and to pay my interest. My good old banker, with whom I had done business for 20 years——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BINDERUP] may proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINDERUP. My old banker said to me: "Charlie, how about paying this note?" I looked at him in surprise. I said, "Why? Do you not want me to do business with you? You are not afraid of me, are you? I have just given you my property statement. I am worth more than I have ever been worth before in my life, and business is wonderful. Profits are good. Do you not want to do business with me any more, or why do you want me to pay this note?"

The old gentleman smiled and turned to his desk and got a letter. He handed it to me and asked me to read it. The letter was from the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City; that is our bank in my district. I read the letter, and now let me tell you what was in that letter. Let me repeat that every banker, member bank of the Federal Reserve, and most other banks, received a similar letter. Those that did not belong to the Federal Reserve bank were supposed to be influenced by the letter just the same.

The letter from the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City said to my banker, and to your banker, that they were restricting credits; that they had raised their rediscount rate to 7 percent minimum in Kansas City and as high as 20 percent, considered penalty interest, if the borrowings were not reduced, loans classed by the Federal Reserve banking system as "unessential loans." Seven percent minimum—that was more than I was paying my banker for the use of the money. The letter also said that they had restricted the number of loans that were called these "nonessential loans"; that there were many things whereon they had rediscounted paper before that they would not rediscount any more. This made it impossible for my banker to rediscount a great deal of his paper, and so he had to collect and pay up.

After I had read the letter my old banker said to me, "Now you understand. Don't you see why it is I am asking you to pay your note? It is so that we can pay our obligations to Kansas City, in order to eliminate the impossible interest that we have to pay, and reduce our indebtedness with them." I understood, so I started to spread the fire of contraction of credit and money. I went out and said to everybody who owed me, "Pay up. You must pay up." And everybody else went out—hundreds went out, thousands went out, millions went out. Everybody said to everybody else, "Pay up. Pay up." And so we began to force collections among each other. We sued each other. We abused each other. We trampled upon each other in the mad scramble for money, in order to get hold of a little miserable cash, so that we could pay up. I sold the last house I built for less than cost, in order to pay up, sacrificing, as everybody sacrificed, to follow the edict that had issued forth from that meeting of the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve bank at 12 o'clock on the 18th day of May 1920, which edict was issued to the 12 Federal regional reserve banks of the United States.

And with this demand to pay up, farmers threw everything they had on the market. They sold their eggs finally for 5 cents a dozen, their butter for 10 cents; they sold their hogs for 2 cents, shoats for 1 cent a pound. They sold wheat for a quarter, and oats for 11 cents. They threw everything they had on the market and congested the market, in this campaign to pay up that issued from the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve banks in Washington, D. C.

And the merchants sold their goods, emptied the shelves, and congested the market, in an effort to pay up. They discharged their clerks to pay up, and, since they were unable to buy for lack of money, the factories closed down and discharged their employees, and thus was once more crucified on the cross of gold—money—the farmer and the laboring man, their purchasing power and consuming power paralyzed because they had that secret meeting on the 18th day of May 1920, these wizards of finance, these hounds of monopoly and vultures of greed.

They took away from us the circulating medium of exchange, the lifeblood of trade and industry, our money and our credit. And so the campaign to pay went on and on. Every time we paid the banker a dollar, he sent it to the Federal Reserve banks to be destroyed, burned up, or perhaps not exactly burned, but thrown into a vault and locked up, which means the same thing so far as the money is concerned. It might as well have been burned.

Or else the banker locked it in his own vault, in order to make his bank safe, to increase his cash reserve. And even with their best efforts, 15,000 of our banks went broke, and all of them would have gone broke had we not come to the rescue in 1933. And the check-book money, based on credit—it vanished like the dew before a summer sun. And so the campaign went on and on, and in a short time it reflected more drastically on agriculture, because agriculture has no protection. Its prices are decidedly governed by supply and demand. The farmers were selling their products for one quarter of the cost of production. It could end only in bankruptcy. And so it followed; farm after farm was sacrificed on the block of bankruptcy. Thousands and hundreds of thousands went into bankruptcy, until at the present time, as I said in the beginning, peace has its horrors no less than war.

A dollar in the hands of selfish greed and money monopoly is more dangerous, more powerful than shot or shell, than sword or gun. The old unequal battle went on and on. The power of capital and predatory money monopoly, centralized in the modern Frankenstein, the Federal Reserve Banking System, privately owned, against the toiling masses, the great producers of all wealth.

Now let me reply once more to my good friend, the Congressman from Pennsylvania, Mr. FOCHT. In answer to his question, let me repeat that the reason we have not overcome this disastrous depression is because we have not all yet recognized what the trouble is. We do not know the cause. We are like children groping in darkness. And until we know the cause, we can never effect a cure. We have failed to recognize the fact that money measures value by its own abundance. We have failed to recognize the function of money that measures the sweat of the brow of man. We have failed to recognize the little old principle of Adam Smith. They called him the father of political economy, when he said, in common language—

> When you double the amount of money in circulation, you double the price of everything, and thereby you divide your debt in two, because it takes only half as much labor and the products of labor to pay the same amount of debt.
> If you divide the amount of money in circulation, half as much, you divide the price of everything. By dividing the prices on everything, you double your debt, because it takes twice as much of labor or the products of labor to pay the same amount of debt.

A little simple example that is true in principle.

And now, my friends, I want to return and repeat once more those outstanding facts relative to the crime of May 18, 1920, when the people were robbed of their money, the lifeblood of their trade and commerce, that bankrupted the Nation. I want again to recall the words of the Comptroller of the Currency, our old, white-haired friend, John Skelton Williams, the ex-officio member of the Board, the great friend of humanity, when he once more warned the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve bank, and said to them, in substance, this: "Gentlemen, you cannot take away from the people their money. Don't you realize they have promised to pay in dollars, and even now there exists less than one-tenth of the amount necessary to meet the people's obligations? Don't you realize our banking system is built on a foundation like a mist, a cloud, or a shadow, a little spark called confidence, that exists only in the brain of man, and that when you take away from the people $2,000,000,000, one-fourth of the basic money of the Nation, you will snuff out this little spark, and the whole financial system will fall and you will bankrupt our banks and wreck our whole economic system?"

They answered him and said—and by the way, they are still saying the same thing, and there are those in Congress who are helping them say it; it is the sole object of Wall Street, and I speak of Wall Street as a symbol of human greed, as it is considered in the minds of the American people—they answered him and said, in substance, this: "We have too many small banks, and what we need is a strong chain system of banking", implying, with headquarters in New York and Wall Street, the cancer at the heart of our great Government.

And once more John Skelton Williams arose. Let me again repeat. It is so important. It sets out the fact so absolutely and definitely. He said to the members of the meeting in substance this: "Don't you see that the farmers and the laborers have mortgages on their homes and farms, and that they will wake up some morning and find all that is left of their homes and farms is the mortgage, and some day they will know that by creating this scarcity of money you thus wiped out their equity?"

But the meeting went on practically undisturbed except for the objections of John Skelton Williams and one or two other bankers who as yet had not had all of their conscience removed.

Mr. HILL of Washington. What was the reply to John Skelton Williams?

Mr. BINDERUP. Oh, yes; the reply to John Skelton Williams was in substance this: "The farmers and laborers have made a lot of money throughout the war and after the war, and they will stand the shock." They knew it was a shock. Yes, Governor Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, said, at the meeting, "This is a drastic remedy, but we believe it is necessary."

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINDERUP. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN].

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman has referred to a certain meeting May 18, 1920. I would like to ask the gentleman to include in his remarks a copy of those minutes which may be pertinent to the speech he is making, including the names of the representatives who were present.

Mr. BINDERUP. I thank the gentleman very much for his suggestion and his contribution. In reply, may I say that the minutes of this meeting are very long, and would take up a number of pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I fear might be objectionable.

Mr. COLDEN. Just include the parts that are pertinent to the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. BINDERUP. Yes, I am including these in my remarks; and one of the first days, from this floor of Congress, I will give you the name and business connection of each banker present.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I say the remedy, it is a glorious remedy—the cure, and it is a simple cure—for these disastrous depressions that have wrecked our great Nation 26 times, lies in knowledge that is light and wisdom that is power. By the past we shall know the future. The past is the prologue. Know the cause of these disastrous depressions, and know that all depressions, all panics, are man made, just by a few men interested in keeping the control of money; inflating by bankers lending a credit money, fountain-pen money, figures on the book, lending dollars that do not exist, that have never been made; lending an intangible thing, a vision, a dream of a dollar, and then asking payment in something else—a dollar that is tangible, it has never been made, it does not exist. Impossible my friends, impossible; inflating by the use of the debt of the United States—Government bonds and the debts of the people as the basis of our money—inflating and raising prices to an unreasonable level, and then all at once having a meeting, as they did in Washington, D. C., on the 18th day of May 1920, and taking away from the people this bankers-credit money, based on debt, contracting thereby our currency, and collapsing a great nation from the highest plane of prosperity to the lowest level of deprivation and starvation and misery and want.

Mr. Speaker, I know there are millions and millions of people of our great Nation that will welcome, and shout back "Amen", when I make the following announcement. A challenge has just been issued to predatory wealth, to Wall Street, and to international bankers. A bill has just been introduced that demands in no uncertain terms that this sacred right and privilege, this constitutional guarantee to the people, that Congress shall coin and regulate the value of their money, has been included in the bill that has just been introduced in this Congress. So the great battle is on.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter written by former Senator Robert L. Owen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a cablegram from His Excellency Jules Jeanneney, president of the Senate of the French Republic, expressing, in the name of the Senate of France, assurance of its great sympathy upon the occasion of the recent disaster to school children and teachers at New London, Tex., which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the noxious weed is one of the major menaces which in time will destroy a large part of the farming lands of the United States, which noxious weed is a perennial plant, propagated for the most part by an underground root system which, if left unchecked, literally takes possession of the soil in which it grows and chokes out the farmers' crops; and

Whereas an exhaustive investigation was made of this problem in 1930, and it was concluded that noxious weeds were costing the United States $3,000,000,000 every year, and that this amount has been increasing ever since the foregoing figure was arrived at, and will double within the next few years; and

Whereas Iowa, being a great agricultural State, has realized the growing menace of the noxious weed and is in sympathy with any organized effort to control it; and

Whereas there has been introduced in the Congress of the United States certain legislation to aid the various States in their fight on the noxious weed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture have this important subject brought to their attention to the end that adequate Federal legislation be provided to assist in eradicating the noxious weed in the several States so as to save the farms for the farmers of America, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, to each United States Senator and Representative from the State of Iowa, to the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to the President of the United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of Georgia—

SECTION 1. That the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States of America be, and he is hereby, requested to recommend to the Congress of the United States that laborers employed in the manufacture of turpentine and rosin and naval stores products be classified as farm laborers.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture, if within his authority and power to do so, make such classification by Executive order for the purpose of classifying turpentine laborers as farm laborers from inclusion under the unemployment compensation laws of the United States and the several States.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture commit himself to the purposes outlined in this resolution and take appropriate action for the determination of this classification, as outlined herein.

SEC. 4. That a copy of this resolution, when adopted by both Houses of the General Assembly of Georgia, be certified and transmitted to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States; and that a copy thereof be also transmitted to the presiding officers of the respective Houses of the Congress of the United States.

Whereas screwworms were not known to exist in the State of Georgia or in Florida, South Carolina, Alabama, Tennessee, or North Carolina prior to 1933, and the first case of screwworm was reported near Boston, Ga., during the first of July 1933. By the end of 1933 it had spread to approximately 64 counties in the southern part of Georgia. A reliable estimate fixed the number of cases in Georgia in this short time at 75,000. This insect continued to spread rapidly, so that by the end of the year 1934 it had established itself in approximately 110 counties in the State of Georgia, and it was estimated that there were 1,222,000 cases, with 75,000 deaths, in Georgia alone; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States came to the assistance of the farmers in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, and Texas, in an attempt to solve this great problem in these States by approximately $480,000 for a screwworm educational and control program, which was to be conducted by the United States Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, United States Department of Agriculture. And as a result of this screwworm control program by the end of 1935 the screwworm cases in the State of Georgia had been reduced from 1,222,000 in 1934 to 75,680, with only 316 deaths. The number of cases had been reduced in Florida from 1,222,000 cases in 1934 to 153,002 at the end of 1935. There were similar reductions accomplished in the other States in which screwworms had established themselves. The Congress of the United States continued the screwworm educational and control program during the fiscal year 1937, and as a result only 2,174 cases were reported in the State of Georgia from January 1, 1936, to December 31, 1936. Only 43,754 cases were reported in Florida for the same period. Screwworms were practically nonexistant in the States of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina, with a great reduction in the States of Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, California, and Oklahoma; and

Whereas the livestock industry in the State of Georgia is increasing rapidly and is proving one of the most profitable enterprises for our farmers it is believed that if screwworms are not controlled it will have a disastrous effect upon the future livestock industry of this State. The screwworm experts of the United States Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine who have been carrying on research work on screwworms for a long number of years have indicated that screwworms only overwinter in the State of Florida and in the southern counties in Texas, which is only a small portion of the State of Texas. If they are correct in their statements regarding the areas in which screwworms can overwinter, then the State of Georgia could only be reinfested by flight or by the movement of infested animals from the States of Florida and Texas; and

Whereas Hon. Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, has made the statement that the screwworm educational and control campaign will be discontinued after the fiscal year 1937 and if this program is discontinued we can reasonably expect that the screwworm population will build up in Florida and spread to the other Southeastern States, the same to hold true in Texas with a spread to the Western and North Central States. If this program is discontinued, the livestock owners in Georgia and the Southeastern States and the Western and North Central States will continue to have to fight this destructive insect for all the years to come. If this program is continued, there is a possibility of eradicating the screwworm in Georgia and the Southeastern States, and to perfect a better control in that area of Texas where the pest overwinters: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia (the Senate of Georgia concurring), That we urge the Members of the Georgia congressional delegation to do everything in their power to get the United States Department of Agriculture to continue this screwworm control program and to support adequate appropriations for same and to urge that the United States Department of Agriculture attempt eradication in the State of Florida and continue the control program in the State of Texas and any other section where outbreaks occur; be it further

Resolved, That if eradication is not feasible, to continue the screwworm control program in the State of Georgia as well as other States; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution immediately to each Member of the Georgia congressional delegation, to the chairman of the Agricultural Appropriation Committee in both the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate, and a copy to the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, and to Mr. Lee A. Strong, Chief, Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to apply available Federal aid to the salvation of the American farmer and the restoration and stabilization of American agriculture as of more vital national concern than the eradication of noxious weeds

Whereas among the pending bills in Congress, whose sponsors seek popular support because of proposed Federal aid to States with alleged resulting benefit to agriculture, is H. R. 4009 appropriating $50,000,000 for the next fiscal year to be made available to States on a matching basis for the eradication of noxious weeds; and

Whereas while the American farmer realizes that weed eradication is essential to successful farming and knows that weeds spring from the soil and, if not checked, will choke out his crops, he also realizes that the problem of eradicating or checking weeds is negligible and of no serious concern compared to the great problems arising from certain complex economic forces over which he has no control and which have so severely handicapped him and so seriously threaten the future of agriculture; and

Whereas the steady decline of farm-land values to a level which renders them almost valueless as security for loans, with the mounting indebtedness farmers have been compelled to incur and the deplorable situation of the great number of farmer debtors not being able to pay even interest obligations, create problems far more serious and deserving of Federal attention than the eradication of weeds; and

Whereas the estimated waste due to noxious weeds, put at $3,000,000,000 per year, is small indeed compared to the incalculable loss that would result to this country if the great agricultural industry is not stabilized and if farmer debtors are compelled to submit to continued foreclosure and eviction; and

Whereas the farmer has never sought a short workday but has always been and is now willing to toil 12 or more hours each day, 7 days each week, and even additional hours, if necessary to eradicate weeds; and has never asked for security except the privilege of earning a fair and decent living without impending fear of enforced indebtedness and relentless foreclosure and eviction; and

Whereas the State of Wisconsin, as one of the foremost dairy and agricultural States in the Union, has always favored any program to promote agriculture, has always favored and urged Federal aid therefor, and is proud of its leadership in agricultural advancement, but believes that any available Federal aid should be directed to the solution of the more vital and serious problems confronting agriculture, rather than the comparatively minor problem of eradicating weeds: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature memorializes the Congress of the United States to appropriate the $50,000,000 proposed in H. R. 4009, but urges the Congress to make such appropriation available for the lowering of interest rates on the farm indebtedness of America so that the farmers and their families may continue to live in the homes they have made, so that their fields may be tilled and their crops raised and the Nation fed, so that a fallen morale may be restored, so that a sturdy and loyal citizenship may be produced who will be the Nation's defenders in time of need as their forebearers were its founders in the days "that tried men's souls"; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to each House of the Congress and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Joint resolution relating to memorializing the Congress of the United States to provide relief for farmers in drought-stricken areas in this State

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a measure known as H. R. 4945 which proposes, among other things, to appropriate $30,000,000 to the Works Progress Administration to be used to loan to drought-stricken farmers of the Nation to enable them to purchase foodstuffs for their cattle and other necessities; and

Whereas the farmers of this State are in a sad plight due to the drought and forest fires of 1936 and prior droughts and frosts and the depression; and

Whereas thousands of farmers in this State have been forced to reduce and are now reducing their dairy herds below the foundation or basic number of animals and to a point where it has seriously curtailed milk production in this State so as to enable them to purchase foodstuffs to maintain the remainder of such herds until spring; and

Whereas farmers of this State will be in need of millions of bushels of corn, small grain, and grass seed for this spring's planting and sowing; and

Whereas farming is the greatest industry of this State and its dairying industry is one of the greatest in the Nation, and the neglect to grant immediate aid to such industries can have but disastrous effects upon both the State and Nation; and

Whereas the farmers of this State have not received any appreciable Federal aid except under the corn-hog contracts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact into law the aforesaid H. R. 4945 and thereby provide for loans and relief to the stricken farmers of this and other States; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to both Houses of the Congress, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to relieve financial difficulties developing in northern Wisconsin due to Federal purchases of land

Whereas lands owned by the United States are exempt from taxation; and

Whereas the Federal Government has acquired title to large portions of land in northern Wisconsin; and

Whereas Federal-owned land in Forest County constitutes 57 percent of all land within its borders and the percentages of such lands in various other northern Wisconsin counties have reached similarly large proportions; and

Whereas in counties and local units so affected revenues from real estate have fallen off to the point where they are no longer able to meet fixed charges and current operating expenses; and

Whereas the Federal Government has given no financial aid whatsoever to relieve the distress of these local governmental units caused by such Federal purchases; and

Whereas these suffering counties can be presently saved and placed on a firm financial basis for the future only by an equitable allotment of Federal funds to these counties based on the acreage withdrawn from the tax roll by the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact necessary legislation to permit return of Government funds to counties suffering financial distress by reason of deprivation of adequate revenues resulting from governmental acquisition of lands within their borders; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to investigate certain recent charges relative to the distribution of relief in Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. DUFFY.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to enact the bill (S. 419) to promote the general welfare through the appropriation of funds to assist the States and Territories in providing more effective programs of public education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. DUFFY.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Ransom County (N. Dak.) Farmers Union, favoring the enactment of the so-called (redrafted) Frazier-Lemke farm and home refinancing bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Ransom County (N. Dak.) Farmers Union, favoring the enactment of the so-called Thomas-Massingale farm bill embodying a clause known as the cost-of-production clause, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Ransom County (N. Dak.) Farmers Union, favoring the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the City Council of Moline, Ill., favoring the enactment of the bill (S. 1685) to provide financial assistance to the States and political subdivisions thereof for the elimination of unsafe and insanitary housing conditions, for the provision of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings for families of low income, and for the reduction of unemployment and the stimulation of business activity, to create a United States Housing Authority, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of members of the Fraternity of Needleworkers, of Mayaguez, P. R., praying for the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Mansfield, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to change or enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Texas, praying that no law be enacted closing the mails to the New Testament and other evangelical Christian publications or periodicals, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GIBSON presented two memorials of sundry citizens of Grafton, Vt., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or any other legislation of a similar character, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by American Legion Post, No. 10, of Barre, Vt., favoring the passage of the so-called Sheppard-Hill bill, being the bill (S. 25) to prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense and promote peace, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution adopted by the Montgomery County (Md.) Civic Federation, favoring the enactment of the bill (S. 419) to promote the general welfare through the appropriation of funds to assist the States and Territories in providing more effective programs of public education, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, praying for the enactment of the bill (H. R. 2257) to provide old-age compensation for the citizens of the United States, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Women's Bible Class, Church of the Brethren, of Broadfording, Md., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Sheppard-Hill bill, being the bill (S. 25) to prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense and promote peace, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NYE presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Senate concurrent resolution providing for a resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and the congressional delegation from the State of North Dakota, and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, to pass a bill in Congress known as H. R. 4009, authorizing the appropriation of $50,000,000 to aid the various States in their fight of noxious weeds

Be it resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), Whereas the noxious-weed problem in the State of North Dakota has become such a grave menace to the farmers of the State of North Dakota that it is absolutely imperative that immediate steps be taken to prevent the further spread of noxious weeds in this State, that amongst said noxious weeds which are rapidly destroying the fertility of North Dakota farms, are wild morning glory, also known as the creeping jenny or field bindweed, the Russian Knapp weed, leafy spurge, Canadian thistle, perennial sow thistle, quackgrass, Johnson grass, Bermuda grass, nutgrass, and many others; and

Whereas the State of Idaho has experimented in the destruction of various kinds of noxious weeds with very satisfactory results and the funds of the exterminating of said noxious weeds was furnished by the United States Government; and

Whereas the State of North Dakota is not financially able to provide such funds to carry on an aggressive and successful campaign for the eradication and extermination of noxious weeds prevalent in North Dakota; and

Whereas there is now before Congress a bill known as H. R. 4009, providing for an appropriation by the Federal Government of the sum of $50,000,000 to be expended in the various States before June 30, 1938, for the control and eradication of noxious weeds; and

Whereas said bill is of the greatest importance to the farmers of the State of North Dakota in assisting them in controlling and eradicating the various noxious weeds growing in this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the house of representatives concurring), That the Twenty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota go on record as endorsing H. R. 4009, now before the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to all Congressmen and United States Senators representing the State of North Dakota in the Congress of the United States, urging that they exert every effort to bring about the passage of said H. R. 4009; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, with the request that the Department use every effort to bring about the passage of aforementioned H. R. 4009; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, with the request that the matter be placed before Congress to show the whole-hearted support of the farmers of the State of North Dakota behind H. R. 4009.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Utah, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Whereas a large percentage of the lands and water rights located in Duchesne and Uintah Counties, State of Utah, is owned by Indians; and

Whereas the said lands and water rights thus owned are untaxable and the said counties receive no revenue therefrom; and

Whereas between 300 and 400 white families reside upon the said Indian lands, as lessees, and thereby escape taxation; and

Whereas the said counties furnish school for the children of said lessees upon Indian lands and furnish police and other protection for the said Indians and the said lessees living upon Indian lands; and

Whereas because of the conditions above mentioned the said counties have become seriously handicapped for lack of revenue with which to administer county functions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah (the Governor concurring therein), That we urge upon the Congress of the United States to appropriate the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of erecting and equipping a junior college at a site now selected in the city of Roosevelt, Duchesne County, State of Utah, to be jointly used by both white and Indian children; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Utah forward certified copies of this memorandum to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to Utah's Senators and Congressmen.

Mr. DUFFY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to investigate certain recent charges by a Wisconsin Congressman and a member of the staff of the Wisconsin Relief Administration as to the distribution of relief in Wisconsin

Whereas on January 26, 1937, Congressman THOMAS R. AMLIE is recorded on page 556 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as saying: "I may say I do know of my own knowledge of people who have starved in my own district and died as a result of starving"; and

Whereas charges were recently made in the press by a member of the staff of the Wisconsin Relief Administration that there are in 27 counties of Wisconsin children going to bed hungry at night, and that the counties in Wisconsin are comparable to those in Arkansas and other Southern States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature urges the Congress of the United States to investigate the charges herein referred to and to publish its findings to the end that the truth shall be known; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of Congress and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Mr. DUFFY also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass the Harrison-Black-Fletcher bill, providing Federal aid for public education

Whereas the Harrison-Fletcher bill providing for Federal aid for public education was introduced into the Seventy-fourth session of Congress and has been reintroduced at the present session of Congress (Senate 419 and H. R. 2288) as the Harrison-Black-Fletcher bill; and

Whereas this meritorious measure has been supported from its inception by many Members of Congress and men and women throughout the Nation who have recognized the important place of education in our social and economic progress; and

Whereas the bill proposes allotments of Federal funds to the several States for public education on the basis of student population and the relative tax-paying ability of the States; and

Whereas under the proposed plan Wisconsin would receive for its quota of such funds $2,292,202 for the first year with an annual increase for 4 years until the allotments for the fifth and succeeding years reach $6,876,606; and

Whereas adequate support of our public schools has long been a problem of paramount concern to State government and local communities and an ever-increasing tax burden to the property owner which such Federal aid will greatly relieve without neglecting education for posterity; and

Whereas centralized funding of the cost of public education is entirely in accord with economic changes of the past two decades: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact into law the Harrison-Black-Fletcher bill providing Federal aid for public education, and that such aid be allotted to the several States without condition or restriction, to be disbursed and administered by the State agency charged with the duty of administering public education in such manner as the State agency may determine to be for the best interests of public education in the State; be it further

Resolved, That duly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Mr. PITTMAN presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Assembly joint resolution memorializing the United States Senate to oppose the ratification of the proposed Argentine treaty

Whereas we feel that the ratification of the said Argentine treaty will be detrimental to the livestock industry of the United States, by reason of the fact that regulations under such treaty will furnish a means of entry of foot-and-mouth disease among cattle in the United States and the impairment of the present standard breeds of cattle in the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of Nevada, That the United States Senate be memorialized to oppose the said proposed ratification of the Argentine treaty; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators at Washington, D. C., and that copies of this resolution, certified by the proper officers of the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, be transmitted to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and to the Honorable H. A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Assembly joint resolution petitioning Congress for the establishment of a patrol, under direction of the Federal Government, over all the lands coming under the control of the Taylor Grazing Act in the Western States

Whereas under the provisions of the Taylor Grazing Act those lands embraced therein are subject to the supervision of the Federal Government, through the Department of Interior; and

Whereas conditions of depredation of alarming extent by cattle rustlers are being developed on public ranges; and

Whereas local authorities are handicapped by the great areas over which these depredations are taking place, in the enforcement of State laws; and

Whereas a system of patrol and supervision by the Federal Government of said lands would reduce such depredations to a minimum and ultimately eliminate the same: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of Nevada, That the Congress of the United States be petitioned to establish a system of patrol over the public domain in the Western States coming under the provisions of the Taylor Grazing Act; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators and Congressmen at Washington, D. C., and that copies of this resolution, certified by the proper officers of the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, be transmitted to our sister States wherein Taylor grazing districts exist.

INTEREST RATE ON CERTAIN FEDERAL LAND-BANK LOANS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, in behalf of a bill introduced by Representative MARVIN JONES, of Texas, extending for 2 additional years the 3½-percent interest rate on certain Federal land-bank loans.

The concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, is as follows:

Whereas agriculture is one of the basic industries of Texas; and

Whereas during the period of depression no legislation passed by the National Congress has been more beneficial or more conducive to recovery than the reduction of interest on loans by the Federal land bank; and

Whereas there is now pending before the National Congress H. R. 1546, by Representative MARVIN JONES, of Texas, which is as follows:

"A bill to extend for 2 additional years the 3½-percent-interest rate on certain Federal land-bank loans, and for other purposes

"Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the first sentence of paragraph 'Twelfth' of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 'second' of this section, the rate of interest on any loans on mortgage made through national farm-loan associations or through agents as provided in section 15, or purchased from joint-stock land banks by any Federal land bank, outstanding on May 12, 1933, or made through national farm-loan associations after such date, shall not exceed 3½ percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 4 years, commencing July 1, 1935; and no payment of the principal portion of any installment of any such loan outstanding on June 3, 1935, shall be required prior to July 11, 1938, if the borrower shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage.

"(b) The fourth sentence of such paragraph 'Twelfth' (relating to the time limit on payments made by the United States to land banks on account of such interest reduction) is amended to read as follows: 'No payments shall be made to the bank with respect to any period after June 30, 1939.'"

Whereas a continuation of said reduced interest rate at 3½-percent interest per annum is necessary in order to further assist ranchmen and home owners in recovery; and

Whereas said reduction and interest rate will save to the people of Texas millions of dollars seriously necessary to such recovery; and

Whereas the House of Representatives of Texas (the Senate concurring) believe said H. R. 1546 should pass, or some measure substantially accomplishing the result sought by said resolution; and

Whereas the passage of said act will permit the farmers and ranchmen who have during the period of depression accumulated tax deficits and other obligations that are fast being removed, and the reduction in interest charge provided in H. R. 1546 will materially aid said debtor class, in again being able to hold their property and at the same time discharge their obligations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of Texas (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Texas go on record as approving the matters set forth in H. R. 1546, and memorializing Congress to actively support said resolution; and that the chief clerk of the house of representatives be authorized and directed to send a copy, under the seal of the said clerk, to the Members of Congress of Texas; to Senator MORRIS T. SHEPPARD and Senator TOM CONNALLY, of Texas; and a copy of said resolution be forwarded, under the seal of the clerk, to Hon. Jesse H. Jones, Chairman, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as expressive of the desires and wishes of the Legislature of Texas.

PROGRAMS OF PUBLIC EDUCATION—PETITIONS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I also present petitions, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of Dallas, Tex., praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 419) to promote the general welfare, through the appropriation of funds, to assist the States and Territories in providing more effective programs of public education. I ask that the petitions may be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and that the body of one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and the body of one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senator, Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Realizing that the time has come for the Federal Government to assume its fair share of the cost of all education in all the States, and that it is right that the Federal Government should "promote the general welfare" through bearing a fair share of the cost of schools, we the following teachers, parents, and voters of Dallas urge you to support the Harrison-Black-Fletcher bill, which will help the schools in all of the States of the Union

COMPACT FOR FLOOD CONTROL IN CONNECTICUT RIVER VALLEY

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce a letter from the attorney general of the State of Connecticut relating to the proposed flood-control compact.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Hartford, March 19, 1937.

Hon. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GUS: As you know, for several months we have been working upon the flood-control question. We have now tentatively agreed upon a compact. Its contents have not been made public, and we have all agreed that no part of the contents will be made public until commonly released in all four States at one time.

As you know, the so-called Omnibus Flood Control Act of 1936 provided for the building of reservoirs in Vermont and New Hampshire. In our tentatively agreed upon compact we have provided (subject, of course, to the Omnibus Flood Control Act being amended to permit it) for two of the reservoirs being located in Massachusetts. It was felt that inasmuch as this change refers to reservoirs in Massachusetts, that the initiation of an amendment to the 1936 act should come from representatives in Massachusetts. I am advised that Senator WALSH has been furnished with a copy of this adjusted amendment and has been asked to originate it.

You can readily see that inasmuch as the Vermont Legislature is likely to adjourn in another month, if we are going to have our present form of compact approved of by all of the States and Congress, we must be very quick in getting action in Congress in amending the Omnibus Flood Control Act.

We are all of the opinion that there is no basis for objection to the proposed amendment. Really all that it amounts to is deleting the words "Vermont" and "New Hampshire" and permitting the construction of reservoirs for the control of floods in the Connecticut River Valley on tributaries of the Connecticut River.

I do not feel that I can adequately state in this letter the requirement for urgency in this matter. I have been working for almost a year upon it. I have spent hours and weeks of time both in drawing outlines of compacts and discussing the many questions involved with representatives of the other States. We have been required at all times to have in mind the thought that any plan tentatively agreed upon must have successful passage in the legislatures of all four States.

It is now necessary to have two of the reservoirs at the start of the program located in Massachusetts, and in order to accomplish this, as stated above, it will be necessary to amend the 1936 Flood Control Act to permit the building of reservoirs in Massachusetts.

Al Philips was up here from Washington the other day, and I talked with him briefly about it. I told him it was quite possible that representatives from the other States (Vermont, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire) and I might attempt to meet with the entire congressional representation from the four States in an endeavor to advance another plan we have discussed in our joint meetings. This suggested meeting may or may not prove worth while.

May I ask that you take up this suggested amendment with Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, at your early convenience with a view toward expediting the passage of it at the earliest possible date.

If I have not made myself and our wishes clear in this mattter, I shall be very glad to amplify my thoughts in any manner you suggest, either by letter, telegram, telephone, or, if necessary, a trip to Washington.

We have gotten so close to the accomplishment of our purpose after these long months of real hard work that we trust most sincerely that nothing will prevent the approval of the compact.

We are meeting again in Boston tomorrow, Saturday, March 20, at which time I trust the final draft of the compact will be agreed upon. I hope then that the matter can be reported here in Connecticut to Governor Cross next week and that he can take the matter up with our legislature at a very early date. Just as soon as the final draft of compact is completed I shall be very pleased to forward you a copy of it.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. DALY, Attorney General.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2291) to amend the act of May 25, 1933 (48 Stat. 73), reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 223) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 19th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 361. An act to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N. Dak.;

S. 996. An act to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between the towns of Decatur, Nebr., and Onawa, Iowa; and

S. 997. An act to further extend the times for commencing and competing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the cities of South Sioux City, Nebr., and Sioux City, Iowa.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McADOO:

A bill (S. 1946) to facilitate the control of soil erosion and flood damage originating upon lands within the exterior boundaries of the Angeles National Forest in the State of California; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. POPE:

A bill (S. 1947) for the relief of Mary Louise Oxley; to the Committee on Civil Service.

By Mr. REYNOLDS:

A bill (S. 1948) to amend the act of June 7, 1935 (49 Stat. 332), and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 1949) to increase the number of midshipmen allowed at the United States Naval Academy from the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. TYDINGS (by request):

A bill (S. 1950) authorizing the appointment and retirement of Godfrey Neil Wyke as a captain, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GUFFEY:

A bill (S. 1951) to authorize the cancelation of deportation proceedings in the case of Harry Worsley; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 1952) for the relief of Irwin J. Russell; and

A bill (S. 1953) for the relief of Eugenia Scherban; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 1954) to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the Grand (Neosho) River and its tributaries in Oklahoma, Kansas, Missouri, and Arkansas, with a view to the control of its floods, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 1955) to restore without premiums the benefits of United States Government life insurance to certain officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 1956) to promote on the retired list Army officers retired for wounds received in battle; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BYRD:

A bill (S. 1957) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the introduction of American-grown tobacco in England by Sir Walter Raleigh and the three hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the culture of tobacco by Anglo-Saxons—John Rolfe, husband of the Indian princess, Pocahontas, having planted the first acres in the Virginia Colony in 1612; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PROPOSED MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMY

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 96), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the United States Maritime Commission is requested to prepare, and the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce are requested to cooperate with the Commission in preparing, tentative plans for the establishment of an academy for the training of persons to become licensed officers in the merchant marine of the United States, including plans for a course of instruction and estimates of the cost of establishing, equipping, and maintaining such an academy; and the Commission is requested to transmit such plans to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

AID FOR SCHOOLS IN HAZARDOUS CONDITION

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, last week the people of the Nation were shocked at the tragedy which occurred in Texas as a result of an explosion in a public school. There is nothing we can do in reference to that condition and nothing we can do in reference to the tragedy that occurred; but it happens that in the Public Works Administration there are several hundred applications for grants and loans or grants or loans made by school authorities throughout the country, and that in those applications the basis of need as set forth is that the present physical condition of the schools, which are being occupied, and which would be removed from use if the applications were granted and new buildings constructed, constitutes a danger to the lives of boys and girls who are going to the schools. I found in my experience in my State that the applications based on such need were the ones on which it was most difficult to secure favorable action by the Public Works Administration for the reason that school districts which have schools in such condition are the districts which are least able to meet the requirements of the Public Works Administration. In view of the tragedy which has occurred, I think that the Congress of the United States should interest itself in the subject and attempt to work out a policy whereby it will be possible to meet the problems of school districts which are compelling their children to go to school under conditions of hazard.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask unanimous consent to have read, and then that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 97) was read, as follows:

Whereas the Nation has been shocked by the disaster at New London, Tex., in which several hundred school children were killed as a result of an explosion, which explosion, according to preliminary investigation, resulted from defective construction of equipment; and

Whereas there are now pending before the Public Works Administration several hundred applications for loans and grants or loans or grants from the Public Works Administration for the construction of school buildings and facilities which have as their basis for necessity the fact that under the present construction and facilities the lives of the children attending such schools are endangered from fire and other causes: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Administrator of Public Works is hereby directed to file with the Senate a statement setting forth, by States, the number of school projects having for their basis hazard to the lives of the school children, classifying the hazards, and setting forth the amounts of loans and grants or loans or grants requested in the applications.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the request of the Senator from Washington, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR HOLT

[Mr. HOLT asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary, delivered by him on Mar. 16, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

FEDERAL AID FOR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

[Mr. HARRISON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of Federal Assistance to Public Schools, delivered by Senator BLACK on the evening of Mar. 17, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

ADDRESS BY DR. HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK ON PEACE

[Mr. POPE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject Five Sectors of the Peace Movement, delivered by Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick in New New York City on Jan. 10, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5232) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is an important measure involving the appropriation of a little over a half billion dollars, and it seems to me that we should have some explanation of at least some phases of the bill before it is finally passed by the Senate. The bill is drawn in such a way that it is difficult to understand many items in it unless one happened to be a member of the committee or attended the committee hearings. I note that there is an item in regard to petroleum reserves. In the hearings one item of the appropriations was discussed, but another item involving $10,000,000, so far as I could see, was not discussed at all at the hearing. I should like to inquire what is meant by the item at the top of page 6. It provides:

That out of any sums appropriated for naval purposes by this act any portion thereof, not to exceed $10,000,000, shall be available to enable the Secretary of the Navy to protect naval petroleum reserve no. 1.

May we have a brief explanation of that $10,000,000 item?

Mr. BYRNES. That item is carried in the bill every year for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Navy, in case it should become necessary to protect our oil reserves, to drill wells for that purpose. The appropriation has not been used but has been carried in the bill heretofore, so that the Secretary of the Navy may have authority to use it in case it should become necessary to protect the oil reserves of the Government.

Mr. FRAZIER. Was none of this money used last year?

Mr. BYRNES. It was not used but is carried as an emergency item, giving to the Secretary of the Navy the power to use the money in case it should become necessary.

Mr. FRAZIER. On page 5, in the same paragraph of the bill, there is an item of $62,000 having to do with the conservation, development, use, and operation of naval petroleum reserves, an amount which is a trifle less than that expended last year, according to the hearings.

Our naval policy, of course, is supposed to be set up by the Congress but is really set up, so far as it is set up, if there is any policy, by the Navy Department; and we have been repeatedly told by no less an authority than President Roosevelt that we were building a navy for adequate defense only. Now, as I understand it, there are no new battleships or war vessels provided for in this bill. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRNES. There is no provision in the bill for the construction of any new battleships; that is correct. There is provision for the construction of some destroyers and submarines—eight destroyers, as I recall, and four submarines.

Mr. FRAZIER. There is also some provision for the completion of several battleships, is there not?

Mr. BYRNES. Of course, the Senator understands that battleships authorized by the Congress are not completed in any one year, and funds are appropriated each year to carry on the work of construction. Some of the money appropriated in this bill is to be used to continue the construction of the ships now under construction. There are under construction 81, including all kinds of vessels.

Mr. FRAZIER. How much of the appropriations provided by this bill are for the continuation or completing the construction of battleships, cruisers, and aircraft carriers?

Mr. BYRNES. The amount appropriated by this bill does not provide for the completion of the construction, because it will take a much longer time than will be covered by the appropriations in this bill to complete the construction of the battleships.

Mr. FRAZIER. How much is it proposed to appropriate for that purpose by the bill?

Mr. BYRNES. Nine million one hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars for construction and machinery and $6,000,000 for armor, armament, and ammunition.

Mr. FRAZIER. How many aircraft carriers are under construction?

Mr. BYRNES. In all there are built and building three aircraft carriers, either authorized or in process of construction.

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course, the building of aircraft carriers would seem to me to be in preparation for a foreign war rather than merely for protection of our own coasts. In hearings before the House committee, and I think before the Senate committee too, some very noted officers of the Navy have appeared and stated that in the event of another world war the great battleships, and other naval paraphernalia in the form of vessels, would be practically useless, because most of the fighting would probably be in the air and the protection of the coast would have to be by airplanes and bombing planes. Yet we are continuing to build battleships and aircraft carriers. Battleships at the present time cost $50,000,000 or more, cruisers $10,000,000, $15,000,000 or $20,000,000, and airplane carriers, I believe, cost about $50,000,000.

I noticed some little time ago a statement given out by some governmental authority to the effect that the construction of battleships, airplane carriers, and so forth, was going to be continued. Only a few days later Great Britain gave out a similar statement to the effect that they were going to spend several hundred million dollars for a larger Navy. It would seem to me that our naval program and Great Britain's naval program run almost side by side. It seems almost like a race as to whether we shall have a larger navy than Great Britain or whether Great Britain shall continue to be what is termed the "mistress of the seas."

It was only a few short years ago that the Senate approved what is known as the Kellogg Peace Pact, which was in turn adopted, through the influence of Secretary of State Kellogg, by all the great nations of the world. In that pact we pledged ourselves not to be aggressors in any war and practically not to prepare for war. However, each year for military and naval purposes we have been spending increasingly large appropriations, and even since the Kellogg Peace Pact was adopted each year we have been spending more money for such purposes than we spent theretofore. So it is evident that those who have been determining the so-called naval policy of the United States have ignored entirely the Kellogg Peace Pact. In other words, it would seem that we did not mean what we said in the Kellogg Peace Pact in the first place. I do not know whether or not that is the case, but I cannot quite understand why we should have a world peace pact and then continue to appropriate more money each year for naval purposes and war purposes than we have ever before appropriated.

I wonder if the Senator in charge of the bill can tell us what nation is considered our enemy that we need to construct battleships and airplane carriers in order to be in readiness to go to war? Is there any country which is preparing to go to war with the United States?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I am unable to answer the question of the Senator, but let me say to him, and I know he will agree with me, that the policy of the Congress as to the construction of naval vessels is not determined by the Appropriations Committee. The Congress of the United States, after the receipt of recommendations from the Executive, determines upon the policy of the Government as to its Naval Establishment. Congress in what is known as the Trammell-Vinson Act provided for the construction of certain vessels, a certain number of battleships and a certain number of destroyers and submarines, all within the provisions of the treaty with other naval powers.

The Appropriations Committee has no duty other than to comply with the act of Congress and to provide the funds to enable the Navy Department to carry out the policy which has already been determined by the Congress. That is all the Committee on Appropriations has done in reporting the pending bill providing funds for carrying out the policy of construction already determined by Congress.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator again if he believes it is necessary, especially after the adoption of the Kellogg Peace Pact, to continue to build great battleships at a cost of $50,000,000 or more apiece, and to continue to build airplane carriers and cruisers, cruisers with a cruising radius, I understand, of 10,000 or 15,000 miles? They certainly are not being constructed for the defense of our coasts, but apparently for use in foreign wars.

Mr. BYRNES. After the approval of the Kellogg treaty the Congress of the United States determined upon this policy; and the Appropriations Committee, I must again inform the Senator, does not go into the matter of the determination of the policy but considers only the question of providing the needed funds.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator is a Member of the Senate just as the rest of us are, and if the Congress determines a peace policy each of us should be included in the determination, it would seem to me.

Mr. BYRNES. Of course, that policy was determined; and why the Congress determined it the Senator from North Dakota, who voted for or against it, knows as well as I do. The Appropriations Committee has never held, and never does hold hearings, on that particular subject. We are simply providing funds for carrying out the provisions of an act of Congress.

Mr. FRAZIER. If the statements made by officials of the Government, members of the Cabinet, the President himself and other officials, are correct that we are preparing for adequate defense and for defense only, it seems to me we should change the name of our War and Navy Departments and call them the Defense Department. If it is to be our policy to have an Army and Navy for defense only, then let us have a policy of national defense and set up a defense department instead of the War and Navy Departments. Let us work along that line. I know we can save a great deal of money in our appropriations for the Navy, and probably for the Army, too, if we are on a defense basis and not on a war-policy basis. If we are going to plan for defense of our own coasts only, we certainly do not need these great battleships.

I remember the late Gen. William Mitchell made a statement a few years ago that in the event of another world war the safest place for our great battleships would be up the Mississippi River as far as they could get, because, he said, in the event of another such war, the airplanes would play a great part and one well-directed bomb from an airplane would sink the biggest battleship afloat. I think he was absolutely correct. It seems to me the money we are spending in the construction of more naval vessels is rather a waste of public funds and the taxpayers' money.

More than that, we are constructing 80 or more war vessels at the present time. Authorizations have been made and appropriations approved to carry on that work, and further appropriations are included in the bill now before us. Some of these vessels have been laid down and some are to be started under the terms of the bill here today.

Then there is another department of the Government which is dismantling and scrapping many vessels. They are, of course, vessels of a different kind; but it seems to me rather strange that one branch of the Government should deliberately try to scrap 40 vessels, if that is their plan, at the present time, while another branch plans to build a great many more, both at immense expense to the taxpayers.

Secretary Roper, of the Commerce Department, only a few months ago made a statement in a speech in which he condemned the scrapping of some of the ships that were to be scrapped, and, in fact, stated that he had canceled part of the contract. Some resolutions were introduced here by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] in regard to one of the contracts to scrap a number of ships.

I hold in my hand a book by Mr. Ewing Young Mitchell, formerly Assistant Secretary of Commerce, entitled "Kicked In and Kicked Out of the President's Little Cabinet", in which he gives some very interesting facts in regard to scrapping these ships, and says they were scrapped in defiance of law and facts, and names the amounts that the vessels cost, and what the Government is getting for them for scrap iron. He states that evidence was produced that they could be repaired at small cost and continued in service; and he gives the history of the old Leviathan, which has been discussed on the floor of the Senate a number of times, and gives the names of some of the shipping companies which evidently made a lot of money through buying ships from the Shipping Board, running them for a little while, and then scrapping them, or making some other disposition of them.

Mr. Mitchell also discusses the mail contracts. We passed a resolution here giving the President authority to cancel the mail contracts with the various ship companies.

I note that in this book, on page 223, Mr. Mitchell says:

> The President has had the authority to cancel any or all of these contracts—

That is, mail contracts with the various shipping interests—

> since he received the reports on January 11, 1935, Congress having extended this power from time to time. But notwithstanding this situation, every one of these contracts, except one of small importance held by the United Fruit Co. which was canceled at that company's request, are still going strong. The continuation of the contracts is costing the Government more than $2,200,000 per month, or $26,500,000 per annum.

And besides that, we are scrapping vessels at a great financial loss and then appropriating more money to build others.

Mr. President, I notice that this bill contains quite a substantial appropriation for the air forces of the Navy Department. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how much of the money appropriated in the bill goes for naval air forces.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, does the Senator mean the construction or the maintenance of airplanes?

Mr. FRAZIER. Construction, especially.

Mr. BYRNES. In the 1938 procurement fund it is shown that there will be 251 replacement airplanes costing $19,386,000; 104 airplanes as an additional increment, $7,894,000; 42 airplanes for the Naval Reserve, $1,580,000; 2 nonrigid airships, $275,000; increase of inspection force, $51,000.

Under the act known as the Vinson-Trammel Act the Navy has determined upon a quota of 1,910 airplanes as being commensurate with a treaty navy. Under present prospects we shall not have, we cannot have, a treaty navy until 1942. That is, the United States cannot have until 1942 the ships to which the Government is entitled under the treaty Navy, and there is no chance that we shall have all of the airplanes we need for a year or two to come.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if the Appropriations Committee has given any consideration to the proposal to consolidate all the air forces under one head instead of having part of the air forces in the Navy, part of them in the Army, and part elsewhere.

Mr. BYRNES. No, Mr. President; because if the Appropriations Committee should report a provision of that character it would be legislation, and would be in violation of the rules. There is not one amendment contained in the bill as reported by the Senate committee that is in the nature of legislation. The committee has lived strictly up to the rule of the Senate that no legislation shall be reported in an appropriation bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. Any consideration of that subject, then, would have to be made by the committee which is authorized to handle the subject of the consolidation and reorganization of Government departments?

Mr. BYRNES. It would have to come from the Naval Affairs Committee, which reported the original measure, and which can recommend the repeal of the provision for the construction of these ships, or provide for changing naval policies, and would have to agree upon a combination or a merger of the various departments.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I suppose there is no chance of making any reduction in this bill. The Senate committee has reduced the total amount somewhat from that requested by the Budget Bureau, and the House committee also cut it down somewhat, but still the expenditure of over $500,000,000 in peacetime for naval purposes seems to me altogether too great. I hope the Committee on the Reorganization and Consolidation of Departments can work out, before another session comes around, some plan to save a great deal of this money. It seems to me that if we are going to have preparations for military and naval defense, we should have a defense department under one head; that the Army and Navy Departments should be done away with, and all the activities brought in under one head; a defense department, if that is what our policy is. I believe we could save probably half of the present amount, which would mean about half a billion dollars each year in that way.

I respectfully urge upon the Committee on Reorganization and Consolidation, and the committee which is studying the proposal to cut down the expenses of the Government, the reading of this book by former Assistant Secretary Mitchell, which, to say the least, gives some very interesting information. He names officials and dates and places, and makes a very frank statement as to many things which he believes have been "put across" contrary to law and contrary to the interests of the people. Because of some of the instances that I happen to know something about, I feel that Mr. Mitchell is practically correct in the statements in his book, so far as I have examined them, and a thorough study of the book should be made, I think, by a Senate committee.

Mr. President, in these times, when so many persons are out of employment, and so much money is being spent for relief and work relief, it seems to me it is a waste of the taxpayers' money to appropriate and spend a billion dollars a year for what we term "adequate defense" in peacetimes, more money than we have ever before spent in peacetimes, and more money than any other nation has spent in peacetimes up until the last year or two at least. Great Britain and other nations, too, have used as an excuse for increasing their appropriations for their navies especially, and their air forces, the fact that the United States is making these vast appropriations and spending these vast amounts of money.

Of course, I cannot agree that the policy adopted by the Congress would meet the approval of the majority of the people of the country. I believe the majority of the people of our Nation, if the proposition were put up to them in a fair, plain, straightforward manner for their expression of opinion by vote, would vote, I was going to say, to abolish both the Army and the Navy; if not, at least to cut down their expenses very materially, because they cannot understand why it is necessary to build $50,000,000 battleships and then spend one million or two million dollars a year each for their upkeep in these peacetimes, when we are not supposed to be figuring on war with any nation, when it is the avowed policy of the President of the United States himself to have us make preparations only for adequate defense here at home.

Of course, the term "adequate defense" does not mean much to anyone who thinks about the subject. It has been demonstrated time after time that with modern methods of warfare there is no such thing as adequate defense. A $50,000,000 battleship can be sunk, according to experts, by one well-directed bomb; and the same thing is true of the smaller cruisers and other fighting vessels of the Navy. So "adequate defense" does not mean much, after all. I am sure, too, that the great majority of the people throughout our Nation are not in favor of going into another world war, and, in my opinion, they are not in favor of these immense expenditures for preparation for war; and I can see no other reason for a billion-dollar appropriation for war and Navy purposes than the expectation of going into another world war.

I have called the attention of the Senate several times to the words of the late William Jennings Bryan, just after the World War was declared but before we got into it, when he said that the nations which were best prepared were the ones that went into the war first; and he also stated that if the United States had been as well prepared for war as some of the big-army and big-navy crowd had advocated, undoubtedly we should have been in the war right from the start. I think Mr. Bryan was absolutely correct in that statement.

It has always been true, so far as I know, when a war came on, that the countries best prepared were the ones which went into it first. That was, indeed, the case in the World War. And the nations which went into the war got nothing out of it, and we are still paying the expenses of our participation in the World War. The debts which have been repudiated by foreign countries, of course, are being paid by our own taxpayers, and the building of great battleships and the preparations for war, which are now under way, are being paid for by our taxpayers. The vessels in the merchant marine which are being scrapped have been paid for by our taxpayers. Those vessels are either being scrapped or sold for prices away below cost to private companies at the expense of our taxpayers.

Mr. President, I admit that I am ashamed, as a Member of the United States Senate, that the policy has been adopted here of spending a billion dollars a year for war purposes in times of peace, of giving private shipping lines over $26,000,000 a year as a subsidy for carrying the mails, selling them at low prices vessels which have been built by the taxpayers' money, almost giving them away. I am ashamed, as a Member of the United States Senate, that that kind of a policy has been adopted. I will say in defense of the Senate, at least in defense of myself, that, in my opinion, it has not been the Congress which has adopted that policy. The Congress should have adopted a policy, but it has been derelict in its duty, in my opinion, in letting the big Army men and the big Navy men direct the policy and say what it should be.

I see on the other side of the Chamber the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the chairman of the Coordination Committee to Investigate Ways and Means of Cutting Down the Expenses of the Various Departments, and I call his attention to a book written only last year by a former Under Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Ewing Young Mitchell. He made what seemed to me some very startling charges as to expenditures of Government money. He mentions some of the committees of the Senate and some of the Members of the Senate. I respectfully refer the junior Senator from Virginia, in his study of how to cut down expenses, to this book of Mr. Mitchell's, entitled "Kicked In and Kicked Out of the President's Little Cabinet."

I shall not take more time now, as I know it is useless to do so. I have had previous experience along this line. I think, however, that it is important to get a little of this information to the public, at least so that they will know what is being done and how a part of our money is being spent in peace times for war purposes, notwithstanding the fact that we have joined in a pact known as a peace pact, a pact to outlaw war, in which we have obligated ourselves not to be the aggressors in any war and not to settle our disputes by means of war. Yet we are spending a billion dollars per year in preparation for war.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, is the bill now open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. BONE. I have sent an amendment to the desk, and I ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 54, line 3, after the word "plants", it is proposed to insert the words:

Provided further, That no part of the moneys appropriated or made available in this act shall be used for the construction of any naval vessel not heretofore let to contract, by a private contractor or contractors; nor shall any of the moneys herein appropriated or made available be used for the manufacture, by a private contractor or contractors, of the main engines, ordnance, and armament for such vessels, the term "manufacture" to mean the making of castings and forgings (both roughing and finishing) the parts, assembling, and installing.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it changes existing law, although it is drafted in the form of a limitation. The act of March 27, 1934, provides that each alternate ship may be constructed in the Government navy yards, and there is the further proviso that—

If inconsistent with the public interests in any year to have a vessel or vessels constructed as required above, the President may have such vessel or vessels built in a Government or private yard, as he may direct.

That language gives to the President the power to exercise his discretion whenever it is consistent with the public interest. The language of the proposed amendment would repeal that provision and specifically provide that a vessel should be constructed only in a Government yard and not as a result of a contract.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I assume that under our rules and under the parliamentary procedure of this body any provision which in itself is a limitation of this character does not violate the rule to which the Senator from South Carolina has adverted. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, and I will speak later on the bill itself and discuss the subject I have in mind, which involves our navy yards and the drastic curtailment of work in the Government yards. I do not want to make the argument, however, if the present occupant of the chair desires to rule on the point of order raised by the Senator from South Carolina. I do not believe the point is tenable. I think the amendment has to do with a limitation. It is not legislation, but has to do merely with a limitation on the expenditure of the funds. I remember many instances where limitations of this kind have been inserted in appropriation bills in the Senate, and it has frequently been stated on the floor that they do not impinge upon the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order and holds that the amendment of the Senator from Washington is merely a limitation.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the amendment very briefly. I am happy to observe that in the bill the provision which would in practical effect have destroyed the operation of the Philadelphia Aircraft Factory, into which we breathed the breath of life by an amendment to the naval appropriation bill in 1934, has been stricken from the bill. The Senator from South Carolina has pointed out today that that provision, to which I had intended to make objection today, has been removed from the bill, and I express my great gratification that we are at least preserving that small part of the Federal operation in the aircraft field.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he starts his discussion?

Mr. BONE. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Can the Senator give us some idea as to whether it might be expected that Government navy yards could construct or would construct these vessels as cheaply as they could be constructed in private navy yards? What I have in mind is that I understood, from an article I read some months ago—and I may not be correct in my recollection—that there were bids on the construction of a sister ship to the Washington and the Manhattan which ran about at least a third higher in the Government yards than in private yards. I was wondering whether the Senator intended to cover that matter in his discussion.

Mr. BONE. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have no intention at the moment of going into the question of comparative costs, because that would involve a very lengthy discussion, and that field was covered in considerable measure when the Munitions Committee appointed by this body went into the matter of building costs. I have upon one or two occasions called attention on this floor to the cost of the cruiser Louisville, erected in the Bremerton Navy Yard, a ship which was built at a much lower cost than the cost of similar cruisers in private yards.

I may say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I would not tender the pending amendment were I not firmly convinced in my own mind that the Government can build its own warships and navy auxiliaries at lower cost than they can be built in private plants. Over and beyond that, however, there is a moral reason why the Government should become self-sufficient in time of war and get rid of practices which it seems to me have been a challenge to the moral integrity of this country.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, does he recall the instance where competitive bids were submitted by Government yards and by private yards on the building of a large class of vessels, and there was a very great discrepancy, much higher bids being submitted by the Government yards than by the private yards? I do not know the facts; I am merely asking for information.

Mr. BONE. I do not recall the incident to which the Senator refers. I have very fresh in my mind the figures as to the Louisville and a sister ship built at that time. Further, I have in mind a very tiny part of the record that was made by the Munitions Committee of the Senate, where it was shown that private shipbuilders were invited to come to Washington and get together on their bids.

Beyond that, there is another aspect of this matter which I desire to make the burden of my very brief remarks today, and which has to do with the drastic curtailment of work now contemplated with respect to our Government navy yards.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. POPE. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in the hearings before the Munitions Committee very careful data were submitted on the comparative cost in Government navy yards and private plants, and as I recall the facts, there was a rather surprising difference in favor of Government construction.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I have not the time nor the inclination at the moment to go into that subject. I am merely asserting that that is the fact, and I assert it because I became so convinced as the result of the inquiry which the Members of this body made into that business.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Did we not have a pretty fair demonstration upon that question during the past year, when the question of building a floating drydock was under consideration by the Navy Department?

The Senator will remember that the only bid received from private companies was the bid of the Bethlehem Co., which was something in excess of $21,000,000. While the Navy Department has not seen fit to give us the exact figures on the estimates of the Mare Island and the Bremerton Yards, the indications are that they were something around $16,000,000, or about $5,000,000 less than the Bethlehem bid. It seems to me those figures indicate that where a Government yard can compete upon the same basis as a private yard—that is, where they are both starting out from scratch—it is possible for the Government yard greatly to underbid the private yard. The reason why it has been possible for private yards to underbid Government yards in some instances was that the private yard was completely equipped for the building of the particular kind of a ship. Therefore it could underbid the public yard; but where they both started from scratch, with no equipment for building a floating drydock, the estimates by the Government yards were about $5,000,000 less than the private bid.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, what my colleague has suggested is my understanding of that situation.

Preliminary to my statement about the situation which now confronts us, I desire to refer for just a moment to the demand for preparedness which underlies the present program of the Government in the matter of both its military and its naval program.

I think it was demonstrated to the satisfaction of those who read the RECORD that for something less than $24,000,000 the Government could so expand its naval building facilities that it could not only handle the program contemplated under existing acts, but could even handle a naval-race program. That sum—something less than $24,000,000—would provide dies, jigs, tools, cutting and welding equipment, docks, building facilities, and ways by which the Government could become master of this situation so far as it affects national defense. I have been unable to understand why the Congress of the United States does not want its Government, the Federal Government for which we speak, to become self-sufficient, at least to the degree where it would not have to rely on private agencies which might, and probably would, do to us what was done to us during the war by a great powder-manufacturing concern, which told us it would not build necessary facilities until the Government made a contract which reflected such a profit as the company was willing to accept.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will refresh his memory, I think he will recall that practically the same situation was encountered by the Government in its effort to win cooperation from one of the private shipbuilding companies. The New York Shipbuilding Co. refused to enlarge its facilities to the degree the Government required until it could be assured of a larger return for its trouble.

Mr. BONE. That is correct. If we should become involved in another war we would simply run into the same situation we met before. There would be more Hog Island scandal, more profligate and prodigal outpouring of money. Repetition of such conditions could in no small measure be removed—probably to the extent of 75 percent—by the Federal Government expending just a little more money, yes, less than half what one major capital ship is going to cost us, if newspaper reports of costs are correct.

There has been a suggestion that the new battleships will cost $60,000,000 apiece. Yet $24,000,000, Mr. President, will expand our building facilities so that we can build our own warships. What legitimate criticism can there be of that program? I may say, in justice to my brethren who do me the honor to listen to me, that I am not proposing in this amendment that that be done; but the amendment, of course, would lead to the expansion of the Government yards.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. BONE. Indeed, yes.

Mr. KING. I am very much interested in the last observation the Senator made. Some years ago I attempted to make a study of the comparative costs of the production of battleships, submarines, and all other naval craft in privately owned yards under contract with the Government and in the yards owned by the Government itself. The conclusion I reached from the comparative statement was that by construction under contract the Government saved a great deal of money. Has the Senator made observations and calculations and examinations that enable him to speak with any degree of authority as to the difference in cost between privately produced and manufactured naval craft and those which are manufactured by the Government?

Mr. BONE. I have had the benefit of the inquiry, research, and findings of the experts who were retained by the Munitions Committee of the Senate, who went into this question and secured as nearly as possible a break-down of costs incident to the expansion of Government yards. We went further, however, and interrogated naval officials and the owners of private yards that built ships for the Government. I asked those men to produce for me a break-down and a study of the figures involving wages and cost items. They have not been forthcoming. I asked a member of the naval staff whether they had ever had a break-down of costs, a study of costs in private shipyards, and the answer was "no." Up to that time the Navy of the United States—our naval department—had never had an intelligent or understandable study or break-down of figures of costs in private shipyards, and to this day they have not had that sort of a study.

Mr. President, this tremendous program of building takes us in clear up to the eyebrows. We are pouring out a flood of money that must almost be staggering to the imagination, and the whole world is going berserk. We are going right along pouring out a vast sum of money in naval preparation; and this bill, as I understand, calls for around half a billion dollars. In the face of this tremendous building program, let me say that I have and I now desire to present to the Senate a memorandum from the Navy Department, emitted about the end of the year, which points out that a vast number of discharges of Federal employees in Government navy yards impends. It is upon us. I suspect that other Senators are receiving the sort of mail I am receiving—mail from employees of Government navy yards protesting against drastic lay-offs. I know Senators must have received letters of that kind from employees and representatives of employees of the Washington Navy Yard. Senators have told me they have received that sort of mail.

In the circular from the Navy Department—and it is not a confidential circular—it is said:

> In view of the prospective discharges from many of the continental navy yards, and the fact that the reduction in force unfortunately will probably reach high figures, commandants should especially satisfy themselves that the efficiency lists as of 31 December, 1936, show correctly the real relative merit of all employees, and that neither prejudice nor partiality have a part in making up these lists. As the efficiency lists, especially in the face of prospective discharges, vitally affect the well-being of employees and their families, it is essential that they be prepared with absolute justice.

Whether it be right or wrong, this means that in these perilous times of economic stress, to those on a proscription list the ax is going to fall. It is going to fall on the necks of—let me quote the language—

Large numbers of men in the form of drastic reductions of the personnel.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. Will not the same condition apply to the shipbuilding companies in case of enlargement of facilities by the Government? Will not the private shipbuilding companies have to lay off their men?

Mr. BONE. Undoubtedly that is true. I have in mind that if we must make the selection, then for the sake of national defense, for the sake of making our Government the possessor of adequate instrumentalities of national defense which it can wield without asking any private individual whether he will do certain things or not do them, I prefer, in the situation which has arisen, to see my Government protect itself, protect its own agencies, rather than those that are privately owned. I am sure that, if the Senator does not agree with my viewpoint, he will, at least, understand why I would make this sort of an election.

Mr. MOORE. I do understand, and, if the Senator will allow me further, I should like to say that I am very much interested in what he is saying; but in one navy yard there are, for instance, 200 men, while in one shipyard in New Jersey there are 10,000 employees, and I suggest the query to the Senator whether it is better to use the 200 men in the navy yards in repairing ships or to do the work of building all the ships there and throw out of employment 10,000 men in yards in New Jersey? Of course, the Senator might well say that they could move out of New Jersey, but that would certainly not be desirable.

I throw out the suggestion to the Senator that if the building of ships was confined to navy yards, then when the ships were built and the program completed, thousands of men would be thrown out of employment at one and the same time.

At private yards, the work being diversified between war vessels, commercial ships, and so forth, the men are kept more continuously employed.

Mr. BONE. There is a very large navy yard at Philadelphia, and it does not follow at all that the 10,000 men in New Jersey would be thrown out of employment. It simply means that Uncle Sam would do enough work in his own navy yards at least to keep those men employed, even if the Navy Department is not willing to see adopted an amendment such as I have suggested. I cannot view with other than alarm and without a protest the conscious, purposeful crippling of our own arms of defense, upon which fundamentally we certainly would have to rely in time of stress and storm, and I think that logic calls upon us to protect these Government agencies of national defense.

Due to the completion of work on naval vessels now in course of construction at the several navy yards, heavy discharges of civilian employees will take place in the navy yards during the next 6 months. The process of laying off men is now in progress and will increase in momentum during the month of May. According to recent estimates of the Navy Department, there will be about 5,200 employees discharged during this period.

Let me say parenthetically that this opinion is given to me by officials of labor organizations who are in very close touch with this work; I am assuming that they are accurate; but I give the Senate the information concerning the source whence the figures come, so that if further question be raised as to their accuracy any Senator or the Navy Department itself may give the Senate further information.

These discharges will be distributed as follows:

New York Navy Yard	1,000
Philadelphia Navy Yard	1,000
Norfolk Navy Yard	750
Washington Navy Yard	670
Puget Sound Navy Yard	500
Charleston (S. C.) Navy Yard	400

All these men will probably be discharged during the period from March to July of this year.

Beginning in July the Mare Island Navy Yard will be affected to the extent of 200 men and the Portsmouth, N. H., Navy Yard to the extent of 80 men. There is also involved the probability that unless steel shall be delivered promptly additional discharges will follow.

The slowing up of the navy-yard work resulting in these heavy discharges has been in contemplation for many months, and yet during this time work of various kinds has been let to private contractors which could have been assigned to navy yards, thus reducing the number of men to be discharged. Last fall, for instance, all six sets of main engines for the submarines appropriated for last year were let to private contractors; that is, three sets were let to the Hooven Owen Rantschler Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, and three sets were let to the Winton Engine Corporation, of Cleveland, Ohio; whereas, three sets of the engines should have been allocated to navy yards under the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell Naval Construction Act of March 27, 1934, which requires, in effect, that one-half of the naval vessels, including their main engines, and so forth, shall be constructed and manufactured in navy yards and arsenals.

To be sure, the act contains the exception which reads:

Except such material or parts as were not customarily manufactured in such Government plants prior to February 13, 1929.

But prior to February 13, 1929, whenever submarines were constructed in navy yards, the engines were customarily built at the New York Navy Yard. The six sets of engines above referred to were let to private contractors on the pretext that the design of the engines had been changed. However, the Vinson-Trammell Act does not state that the Navy Department may disregard the provisions of the act in case there are changes in design. Everyone knows that the design of naval vessels and of the machinery that goes into them is continually changing, as the result of progress in science and invention.

Similarly, in the fall of 1935, six submarines were authorized by the Naval Appropriation Act to be constructed, three of which were allocated to navy yards; but, instead of assigning three sets of engines to navy yards, only a part of one set was allocated to the New York Navy Yard for manufacture; and the other five and a half sets were awarded to private contractors. In view of the fact that the plans were furnished the navy yard by the private concerns manufacturing the bulk of the work, and the private concerns had the advantage of making economies by the larger quantities of work they turned out, the result was that the navy yard was placed at a disadvantage as to cost in this initial order. Everyone knows that the first batch of any line of work undertaken by a shop always costs more than succeeding orders. In the arsenals the experience has been that the first order usually costs twice as much as succeeding orders. This is due to the extra overhead involved in turning out a small order, organizing the work, and the inability of a shop to always apply the most economical method of production the first time a job is performed. Furthermore, the concerns which received the contract for the construction of these five and a half sets of engines in 1935 had already had a year's experience in the production of six sets of the same engines in 1934 and therefore were a year's experience ahead of the New York Navy Yard in turning out one-half of one set in 1935.

The decision of the Comptroller General of October 29, 1935, touching upon this question, is manifestly in error, due to the fact that he merely states the letting out of the entire engines is within the law, because engines are an intrinsic part of a naval vessel and a vessel is not complete without an engine. He overlooks the fact that the Vinson-Trammell Act specifies not only that one-half of the vessels shall be built at navy yards, but also mentions main engines, and so forth, which means that Congress, in drawing the act, has drawn a distinction between what constitutes a vessel and what constitutes an engine. Manifestly a further tightening up of the law which requires work to be performed in the navy yards and arsenals is necessary even to carry out existing law on the 50-50 proposition.

In 1934 all the Diesel engines for the six submarines appropriated for that year were let to private contractors, notwithstanding the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell Act, which required half of them to be allocated to navy yards. But the Navy Department unofficially assured labor representatives speaking for the navy yards that in the following year, 1935, the navy yards would get half of the engines to build, as required by the law. Notwithstanding this unofficial assurance in 1935, the navy yards received only one-half of one set; and in 1936, following a Comptroller General's decision to the effect that they did not have to build any of the engines in the navy yards, all of the engines were again let to private contractors.

It is also maintained by the Navy Department that, due to the fact that more than 50 percent of the ordnance for all of these vessels is being manufactured in the navy yards and arsenals, therefore, the 50-50 ratio is maintained in the proportion of work being allocated to navy yards. This extenuating circumstance overlooks the fact that the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell Act merely say that the first and each succeeding naval vessels of each category shall be built in navy yards; but it does not specify that the other 50 percent of the work shall be assigned to private contractors. Furthermore, the naval appropriation bill has annually contained a provision to which the present amendment is sought to be attached, which provides that all naval vessels and war equipment shall be allocated to navy yards in case time and facilities permit, and when, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, the work would not cost appreciably more than by contract. Hence, this language of existing law amply covers the more than 50 percent of the ordnance which is allocated to navy yards and arsenals. There is, therefore, no justification for subtracting from the total amount of construction work to be done at the yards, in view of the additional ordnance work being performed beyond the 50 percent required by the law without qualifications as to time, facilities, and cost.

The pending naval appropriation act calls for commencing the construction of 8 destroyers and 4 submarines, whereas last year's bill called for the construction of 12 destroyers and 6 submarines. Due to the completion of vessels now on building ways in the navy yards, there are ample facilities to accommodate the 12 vessels upon which work is to start this year.

In addition to this, one of the battleships appropriated for last year is due to be let to contract, unless my amendment is adopted, requiring both of the battleships to be allocated to navy yards. In other words, if this proposed amendment should be adopted the Government would build both the proposed battleships in its own yards.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. As I read the Senator's amendment, it seems to me it would have the effect of preventing from now on the construction of any naval craft in private yards. In other words, it would suspend all future construction in private yards. Does the Senator approve of that construction of his amendment?

Mr. BONE. The Senator is correct in saying there would be no further contracts let. My amendment would not affect ships under contract—that is, where contracts have been let for ships now being built.

Mr. WALSH. The present law provides for building at least 50 percent of naval vessels in Government navy yards.

Mr. BONE. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator's amendment should be adopted, it would result in no more contracts being let for the construction of naval craft in private yards.

Mr. BONE. That is correct. I know the Senate will understand that the amendment is for that very specific purpose. The effect of the amendment would be to require the building of the two proposed battleships in our own Government navy yards. The navy yards are amply equipped to construct both these vessels, in addition to the 12 smaller vessels appropriated for in the bill now before the Senate. I understand that the bill carries an appropriation for 12 vessels; and if I am in error as to that, I ask the Senator from South Carolina in charge of the bill to so advise me.

During the last session of Congress a comprehensive ship-subsidy bill was passed. The merchant marine board contemplated by that act, known as the Maritime Commission, has now been appointed. If the private shipbuilding interests possess the degree of initiative with which private enterprise is presumed to be endowed they would not be in need of naval work but should be able to fill up their shipyards with merchant-marine construction work. At any rate, the Federal Government is not justified in discharging its own employees and allowing its own plants to stand idle for the sake of shifting the work which can be performed in such plants to robust individualists such as private shipbuilding interests are presumed to be.

Mr. President, by way of conclusion of these remarks, I merely repeat that I see no escape in logic from the conclusion and the assumption that the Government, if it is to continue down this pathway of preparedness—and obviously Congress is thoroughly sold, if I may use that vulgarism, on preparedness, which is made so evident here year by year—then, for one, I want my Government to become self-sufficient in the matter of preparing its instrumentalities of war.

I hope we may have a record vote on my amendment, not that I desire to require any Senator to express himself for the RECORD but I think that the eyes of the country and of the whole world now are being literally glued on this preparedness race, which is so menacing and challenging in its international aspects as to constitute an ominous threat against our civilization. As a result of our experience in the World War, our very unhappy and gloomy and sordid experience, when private munitions makers took a shameless advantage of this Government, we are soon going to have to determine the fundamental question of whether or not this Government is going to be self-sufficient and release itself from the clutches of these gentlemen who in our hour of peril are very prone and very likely to lay aside, as they have done in the past, what would seem to be a spirit of fair play and sportsmanship and take a shameless advantage of their Government.

Mr. President, on my amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] has introduced a bill embodying his views on this question and that bill is now pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs. I respectfully submit to the Senate that, should the Senate ever seriously consider the adoption of the views expressed by the Senator from Washington, it should be done only after the Committee on Naval Affairs has held hearings on the subject and given adequate consideration to the proposal.

I am satisfied that the Senator from Washington does not really intend what I conceive to be the effect of the amendment he has offered this morning. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] a few moments ago asked the Senator from Washington if his amendment would not have the result of requiring all naval construction to be done in Government yards. As a matter of fact, the adoption of the amendment would prevent the construction of any vessels until there was another appropriation bill passed, because the law now provides that the first and each succeeding alternate vessel of each category shall be constructed in Government yards. One is constructed in a Government yard and the next in a private yard.

The Senator's amendment, seeking to accomplish indirectly what his bill provides for, simply provides that no funds appropriated in this bill shall be used for the construction of any vessel in a private yard. Therefore, if one of the capital ships now authorized and appropriated for is given to a Government navy yard, then no funds appropriated in this bill can be used for the construction of the next vessel in a private yard. At the same time, under the law, the Navy Department must give the contract for the construction of the next vessel to a private yard. If it gives it to a private yard the funds appropriated in this bill cannot be used to pay for it under the Senator's amendment.

Manifestly the Navy Department would not use the funds for construction in a private yard and could not construct the vessel in a Government yard, so his amendment would stop the construction of any vessel other than one in a Government yard at this time.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I know the Senator realizes that if there is any amendment he might suggest which would cover the thought he has in mind I would be happy to add it to my amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. The reason why no amendment can be offered is that the amendment would be legislation upon an appropriation bill. That is the difficulty the Senator has encountered. It is the only reason why his amendment has been framed as it is. It does not do what he wants to do and what he desires to do. His bill does. His bill provides affirmatively for construction in Government yards. That can be accomplished by legislation. It cannot be accomplished by putting a limitation only upon the funds in this bill.

I submit to the Senator from Washington, knowing the earnestness with which he has presented this cause and his views on the subject, that he ought to present and make his fight before the Committee on Naval Affairs, which committee alone can recommend legislation and which can arrive at a proper solution of the question.

Mr. BONE. I may say to the Senator that upon several occasions in the Committee on Naval Affairs I have raised this very question. Amendments to naval bills have been submitted by me and considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs in times past. Very shortly I hope to introduce a bill which will require, other legislation to the contrary notwithstanding, the building of all naval vessels in Government yards. That would be a piece of straight-out legislation, which would eliminate completely the whole question the Senator has raised with respect to this being merely a limitation and not being capable of being considered here otherwise than as a limitation and only as a limitation.

The bill I have in mind, if it shall be favorably reported by the Naval Affairs Committee, and if it shall be passed, will entirely eliminate the objection raised by the Senator from South Carolina.

It may be that a sufficient number of Members of the Senate do not agree with that idea; the Naval Affairs Committee may not agree with it; but at least the Naval Affairs Committee and the Senate, if the committee shall vote to report the bill, will then have the opportunity to do the very thing I suggested a moment ago, and that is to decide once for all this question of policy on the part of our Government toward the preparation of its own instrumentalities of war.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I made the suggestion to the Senator in the hope that under the circumstances he might urge this proposed legislation before the Naval Affairs Committee. I really thought Senate bill 1490 was his bill, but evidently I was mistaken.

Mr. BONE. Yes; it is my bill.

Mr. BYRNES. That bill is now pending before the Naval Affairs Committee. The Secretary of the Navy has submitted to the Committee, under date of March 17, a letter with reference to the bill. He sets forth the attitude of the Navy Department; and, inasmuch as the amendment is pending, I shall read this letter from the Secretary.

Mr. BONE. I should like to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNES. The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 17, 1937.

The CHAIRMAN,
Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The bill S. 1490, "To provide that all naval vessels and their main engines, ordnance, and armament should be constructed or manufactured in Government establishments", was referred to the Navy Department by your committee with request for report thereon.

The purpose of this bill is to require the construction of all naval vessels, together with their main engines, ordnance equipment, and armor (including the making of castings and forgings, machining the parts, roughing and finishing operations, and assembling and installing the parts) in navy yards, naval stations, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States.

In general, it must be emphasized that constructing, equipping, and supplying ships and aircraft of the present naval program cannot be accomplished with personnel and facilities now existing in establishments under the control of the Navy Department or any other department of the Government.

With more detailed reference to manufacturing facilities, it should be pointed out that Government plants are not now equipped or are equipped only in a limited manner to manufacture Diesel engines, large units of electrical equipment, engines and gears, large valves and forgings, drums and headers for boilers, technical fire-control apparatus and instruments, gyro compasses, gages and instruments in general for ships and aircraft, aircraft and aircraft instruments, and certain structural steel and shapes.

These facilities, therefore, must be either acquired or greatly expanded to accommodate the volume of work which would be added by reason of the requirements of the bill S. 1490.

In addition to plant facilities required for manufacturing the various items that have been enumerated in the preceding paragraph there is for consideration the problem of personnel. If the objects of the bill are to be accomplished, there must be a very large increase in laborers, mechanics, technicians, and so forth, in the many trades which go to make up an industry having the ramifications of ship and aircraft construction.

In order to make any progress at all in the direction of having ships and aircraft which are even reasonably adequate, there must be maintained many departments of research, together with large staffs of design engineers. It need not be demonstrated that the building up of such organizations requires years of time and the expenditure of huge sums of money.

In addition to the time and money that must be consumed in building up plant facilities and training competent personnel, there is for consideration the effect such an organization in the Government would have on the efficiency of the Navy and the adequacy of the national defense facilities.

In the construction of ships and aircraft and their component parts, the field of competition is large. Constructors and manufacturers have their own departments of design and research. There is, therefore, never ending stimulus for one manufacturer to build an airplane, ship, or some part thereof superior to anything in the field. The Navy is in a position, under such circumstances, to take advantage of the best that the market affords.

While the Navy may leave from consideration of the problem any effect which the proposed course of action may have on private industry itself, it cannot overlook the ultimate effect on the whole aspect of national defense.

A major war today means a nation in arms. In such an emergency an immediate and enormous expansion of manufacturing facilities is mandatory if the needs of the fighting forces afloat and ashore are to be adequately met. The World War proved conclusively that this could be accomplished only by the utilization of every industrial plant, the equipment of which could be diverted to the production of war necessities. Complete separation during peacetime of the industrial resources of the Nation from participating in national-defense work will unquestionably handicap seriously the effort of the Nation for defense work in an emergency.

If Government facilities for ship and aircraft construction are provided with the necessary skilled artisans, design engineers, and research technicians there arises in addition to any present consideration of expense and delay to the completion of the national-defense program another serious problem. Personnel and facilities cannot be employed gainfully over a period of years on such technical work as that which is comprised in the scope of ship and aircraft construction. There must be periods after the present program is completed when there will be no naval requirement for these added facilities. Any suggested employment of them outside the Government field would raise the question of Government competition in private business or continued idleness of personnel and plant facilities.

In conclusion this Department is of the opinion that the national defense would suffer immeasurably by the adoption of the proposed plan and the cost of the national defense would be largely increased. The national defense requires the help of private industry to provide facilities and research over a period of time which the Government could not supply. On the other hand, extensive Government competition with private industry, when private industry can do the work properly, is considered basically unsound both as to national economics and as to national defense.

The Navy Department, therefore, recommends against the enactment of the bill S. 1490.

The bill S. 1490 is not in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

CLAUDE A. SWANSON.

That letter is addressed to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee and signed by the Secretary of the Navy.

I simply wish to say to the Senate that the matter is now before the Naval Affairs Committee. The statement of the Senator from Washington and the letter of the Secretary of the Navy shows that the subject is one to which most serious consideration should be given by the legislative committee after the Senator has had an opportunity to study the views of the Department and present his views to the committee.

It seems to me that upon the floor of the Senate, when the proper committee has been given an opportunity to go into the subject, it is not fair to the Senator's cause to have it acted upon, any more than it would be fair to the Department or to the national defense, in my opinion, to adopt it without serious consideration.

I may say to the Senator that, while I share his views as to the condition of the various navy yards today, where a shortage of work necessitates a reduction in personnel at this time, the existing law gives to the President of the United States the power, where it is inconsistent with the public interests in any year to have a vessel or vessels constructed on the alternate plan, to have a vessel or vessels constructed in a Government yard or in private yards, as he may direct. Therefore it is within the power of the President today, under the priviso to the Trammell-Vinson Act, to direct that one of these ships be built in a Government yard, which would solve the problem which has been presented by the necessary reduction in personnel at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator from South Carolina construe the proviso he has just read to supplement the proviso requiring a certain percentage of the ships to be built in navy yards and another percentage by private industry?

Mr. BYRNES. That is the way I construe it.

Mr. WALSH. So the President may set aside the percentage required for building and, if he chooses, have all the vessels built in navy yards?

Mr. BYRNES. I am satisfied that that is the case. I will read to the Senate the language to which I refer:

Provided further, That if inconsistent with the public interests in any year to have a vessel or vessels constructed as required above—

That is, on the alternate plan—

the President may have such vessel or vessels built in a Government or private yard, as he may direct.

It is solely a question as to what the President would consider inconsistent with the public interest; and if it be inconsistent with the public interest to call for the discharge of a large number of men, and it should be so determined by him, he could direct construction in a Government yard rather than in a private yard.

Mr. WALSH. So apparently the President has the last say?

Mr. BYRNES. I am satisfied that he has under this language.

On the other question I am sure the Senator from Washington, if we are affirmatively to provide that hereafter all construction shall be in Government yards, would like to have an estimate as to exactly what expenditure would be necessary; and if we have a large personnel in the Government yards in 1942, when the present naval program is to be completed, I am sure the Senator would like to consider what we would use this increased personnel for; whether we would use them in the construction of private vessels, or whether the repair work would be sufficient to employ them, or, if not sufficient to keep them at work, how we would then reduce the force. I submit to the Senator and to the Senate that these and many other questions that I can conceive of should be considered in connection with the Senator's bill upon which the Department has reported, and upon which, I am sure, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will have a hearing at any time the Senator from Washington may indicate, when he will have an opportunity to present the subject in detail, and with the thoroughness that the subject demands before definite action is taken upon it.

I hope the Senator from Washington, after consideration, will not insist upon action upon his amendment at this time, but will insist upon action upon his bill, which provides affirmatively for construction in private yards and does not merely impose a limitation which will result in tying up the construction of ships, even in Government yards. I fear that it may be so construed that it will prevent the construction of any ships, because the Department says that if they cannot proceed with construction on the alternate plan as required by the present law, they will not be able to proceed at all; and if they do not proceed at all there will be no construction of destroyers or submarines, and the Senator does not want that to happen any more than I do.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the suggestion that the Congress of the United States is so inept, so helpless, so childlike, and naive that it could not correct that condition in 5 minutes is a reflection upon our intelligence.

Do Senators think we cannot construct these ships? I could write a bill and in 10 minutes put it through here, if Senators would vote for it, and then we could go ahead with that sort of building operation.

I desire to say that the letter from the Secretary of the Navy, without employing the reference in an invidious way at all, is what a lawyer would call a plea in confession and avoidance.

He says that during wartime of course we have to thrust a great burden on private concerns. That is what happened during the World War; we thrust this great burden on these astute gentlemen and they made a mess of it, and their ineptitude cost us billions of dollars because we were not prepared to do the work ourselves. We thrust it into the hands of these clever businessmen, who gave us Hog Island and the smelly, messy scandal of the Spruce division. Many grafting fellows should have gone to the penitentiary, but did not.

Another aspect of this matter which we must not overlook is that the very small amount necessary to do this work is so tiny compared with what we are spending that we ought not to blink at it.

Mr. President, my good friend the Senator from South Carolina has said that I should not thrust this sort of thing so obtrusively onto the flood and compel Senators to vote on it when they do not understand it. As a Member of this body—and every other Member has had the same experience—I am compelled time after time to vote for some bill a careful examination into which has not been my lot because I was not a member of the committee which handled the bill. I ask Senators to be witnesses to the accuracy of my statement that as the naval appropriation bill has been reported to the Senate in the last 3 years, each year it has carried half a billion dollars. And how were Senators not on the Naval Affairs Committee able to vote intelligently on those bills? How did they know all the minute details which were locked safely in the breasts and the minds of the able gentlemen in the Navy Department who formulated the bills? Yet all Senators had to vote on them. By saying "aye" they made the Government spend a billion and a half dollars, approximately, in 3 years, and did not have any more information about the matter than about many other things pending in the Congress. That is the way legislation is acted on and passed.

What I have said is not a challenge, because it is a part of the mechanics of legislation. But it is not an answer to say that we cannot pass intelligently on these things. We are compelled to pass on them whether we desire to or not. Every Member of the Senate has to say "aye" or "no" to any bill before us, and thereby possibly be the judge as to whether or not we ought to spend $500,000,000. Is not that the truth? Wherein am I in error in that assertion? Every Member of the Senate must say "yes" or "no" to this particular half-billion-dollar bill and sit in judgment on the wisdom or lack of wisdom of the Navy Department. He has to say whether he wants 12 submarines built, or 6, or 9, as the case may be. So it is a perfectly futile argument, it seems to me, to say that all these matters have to be taken care of in a committee, because the committee sends the bill onto the floor, and theoretically, and under every parliamentary procedure known to Anglo-Saxon civilization, every Member who votes on it, even though he is not a member of the committee, must constitute himself a committee of one to pass upon the merits of the particular piece of legislation.

The Members of the Senate are just as capable, without having the advantage of committee hearings, to pass on this amendment of mine as they are to spend half a billion dollars by their vote on this bill, when probably there is not

1 man in 10 here who can give you the many details of the bill. If there is that fundamental lack of information about the details of the bill, how can there be a challenge to my suggestion, which is very broad in its scope, that we build these vessels in Government navy yards? The intellect of a child can comprehend that.

If the Navy Department wants retained adherence and unstinted loyalty to the principle of private building and development in the naval defense, that is one thing. They have been very frank in saying that they want rugged private initiative preserved in the naval program, and the War Department takes the same attitude in connection with the War Department bill. But it is that very fundamental principle which I desire to challenge positively, directly, and purposefully, by the amendment, and certainly we do not have to know how much it costs to build a submarine or a torpedo boat to determine whether we want the Government to build its own warships. That is all this amendment provides for.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, it is with regret that I feel that I must vote against the passage of the Navy Department and naval service appropriation bill now pending. This program means, with the amount of regular and supplemental Budget estimates for the Navy for 1938, that we are asked to appropriate in round figures $564,000,000 for the Navy, an increase of some $36,000,000 over the peace record appropriations of last year.

Mr. President, there is included in this bill provision for two new battleships, calling for an expenditure of $126,000,000. That is more than the combined cost of State and local government in Kansas, even when the cost of new social-security legislation is included. It means more than $10,000,000 spent every week by our Government for naval purposes. I can see no need, no justification, for this enormous and extravagant expenditure of public funds. I might support the measure if the appropriations for these two battleships were eliminated, although I myself cannot see the need for the eight destroyers and four submarines also included in the appropriation measure.

Mr. President, we make loud and continued statements that we are a peace-loving people. But we are now spending more than a billion dollars a year, or will be during the next fiscal year, for preparations for war.

It is not seriously contended that we have to spend that much money to maintain peace at home, nor is it contended that we must spend that much annually to defend the United States against invasion. So it seems to me that the only purpose for spending this billion dollars a year must be to enable us to engage in war across the seas again, and I will never vote to send the boys and young men of America overseas to fight other peoples' battles.

The United States of America does not need 87 more war vessels, including 2 new battleships at a cost of $126,000,000, for the purpose of adequate national defense. I am in favor of adequate national defense, but I am opposed to extravagant expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars in the name of adequate national defense, when all the world knows we do not require this much for adequate national defense.

Enactment of the proposed neutrality law, which is a foregone conclusion, presumably will lessen, not increase, the danger of our being drawn into a foreign conflict in which we should not be involved. Therefore I say we should cut down these appropriations for war purposes, not increase them. I am compelled to cast my vote in protest against such a war policy.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am sure we all admire the earnestness and the persevering spirit of the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] in his efforts to bring about the building of all naval craft in Government-owned shipyards. I rise to emphasize the importance of the proposal, and to call attention to why, in my opinion, it would be most unfortunate to adopt it at this time.

First of all, the suggestion is vigorously opposed by the Navy Department. The distinguished Senator from Washington calls attention to the fact that we have a $500,000,000 bill before us, that we are following the lead of the Navy Department in accepting their suggestions as to their needs, and that very few Senators know the details about it. The fact of the matter is that this appropriation bill has been for weeks before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, and I hold in my hand this large volume of the hearings showing the extent to which the House Committee on Appropriations investigated every item of the bill. It has been for several days before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and the bill as reported has lessened the amounts agreed upon by the Budget as essential for the Navy.

Mr. President, we must accept the proposition that the Navy Department is acting in good faith, that it is concerned with the defense of our country from the naval standpoint, and with that assumption and with the recommendation of the Department against the pending proposal, do we not at least owe them a committee hearing where the whole matter may be threshed out and discussed pro and con? Is it not impressive that a great department obligated to concern itself with naval defense says this plan would be ruinous and injurious, and that it is strongly opposed to it?

There is a second objection. Who dares to say how many more millions, if not billions, of dollars it would cost to put our present navy yards in condition to build all the naval craft which it may be necessary to build now and in the immediate future? I think the number of navy yards, large and small, is nine, and nearly all of them are equipped for special and limited work. For instance, the navy yard at Portsmouth, N. H., builds nothing but submarines, and is not equipped to build anything but submarines. Some of the other yards are equipped merely for repair work or for building destroyers, or some other particular kind of naval craft.

I myself offered an amendment, at the request of the employees of the navy yard at Boston, asking for the extension of the structural shop there. Requests were before the committee from every navy yard in the country asking for increases in their facilities, the theory being that if this structural shop, for instance, were built in Boston, that yard could bid for more naval work, and have more naval work than is now being allotted to it. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] will bear me out in stating that millions of dollars were requested by the various navy yards for the purpose of increasing their present facilities so that they could carry on in a better way than at the present time, and not necessarily for the purpose of expanding them so that they could take on the building that is now being done by private yards. Their requests were denied without any exceptions by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask what proportion of the building is now being done in navy yards?

Mr. WALSH. Not less than 50 percent of new constructions, and all the repair work.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BONE. An item was inserted in the appropriation bill—I think it was last year—of four and one-half million dollars to build a dock at Bremerton Navy Yard. An amendment I offered carrying that provision went into the bill but was taken out in conference. I think it was done at the request of the Navy Department. Of course, the Bremerton Navy Yard happens to be in my own back yard, so to speak, and I rather approached the subject with some diffidence; but that amendment would have permitted that great navy yard, one of the greatest in the State, to have equipped itself to do intelligently and efficiently and, I hope, cheaply the class of work that was sought in the case of this floating dock, which obviously will have to be built on the Pacific coast. Yet that item went out, and I think it went out at the request of the Navy Department.

What I cannot understand is why they would object to even that small item—four and one-half million dollars—which, I think, would enable the Government to get decent and respectable bids for building this dock. In other words,

I cannot understand why the Navy Department wants to tie its own hands.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Navy Department has made requests for—and I ask the attention of the Senator from South Carolina—appropriations for improving and increasing and developing shore establishments. I use the expression "shore establishments"; that is the naval expression for navy yards and naval bases, in distinction from naval craft. They have made requests for appropriations for improving, increasing, and developing a large number of shore establishments. The proposal that I was interested in, relating to the Boston Navy Yard, was, I think, recommended by the Navy Department but was far down on their list of favored and immediately necessary projects.

Let me say in this connection that this summer I visited the submarine base at New London, and I was grieved to find the conditions that existed at that submarine base. It is the place where young officers and enlisted men in the finest of health, the most perfect specimens in the Navy, are sent for training in submarines.

As is well known, submarine training is the most injurious to health of any in the naval service. Tuberculosis and other diseases are quickly contracted as the result of training and experience in submarines. The buildings where these men were housed, built during wartime, were dilapidated, insecure, unsafe, and all were firetraps. The toilets were adjoining the dining room. You just passed through a door from the messroom into the toilet. The whole appearance of the building was that of a firetrap. Furthermore, in that particular plant there was a Government instrument worth $90,000 housed in a building that cost $5,000, and that was not even fireproof. If a fire started at the New London base it would be impossible to prevent a complete disaster to the whole base.

I made up my mind that I would leave nothing undone to see that proper buildings were constructed at New London, especially for the service that causes the largest extent of physical exhaustion of any service in the Navy. Nothing has been done. The reason given is, "We just cannot do it. We have not the money." Like conditions exist in many other shore establishments and naval bases. It is most regrettable that we are unable in many instances to decently house the patriotic men who are serving us in the Navy.

But I must not digress further. All I am attempting to say is that perhaps we ought to do what the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] says we should do; but certainly we should not do it until the subject has been studied, certainly not until it is known how much more it is going to cost, how much more expansion will result from it. Certainly we ought not to do it until we know whether or not it is going to be really beneficial to the whole problem of national defense. Furthermore, I have a rather open mind on the question. Personally, after further study I might favor the expansion of our present navy yards to the point of doing all that is essential in connection with the building of naval craft; but I do recognize the fact that the naval program is a national one and that it is larger than personal wishes or local benefits by having Government employees rather than private works do the work.

I was impressed with the fact that in the selection of airplanes and, to an extent, in the selection of naval craft models, private industry is called upon to give the benefit of experience to help the Navy in its engineering department and in its planning department for the purpose of having the very best and latest equipment for our Navy, and I should dislike very much to see an abandonment of that policy and our Government not be in a position to get the benefits of national research and experiments by private industry.

However, I am not going to talk longer, Mr. President, except to say that, assuming the project has some merit, let us first have a thorough investigation made of the subject. Let us have it studied from all sides. Let us find out why the Navy is opposed to it, and what its reasons are. Let us find out what this new policy, if adopted, is going to cost. Let us find out how many more navy yards we will have to build, how many present yards we will have to expand and equip, how many channels we shall have to dig to get into the navy yards, because some of the navy yards now have channels with a draft of water of only 15 or 20 feet; and if a draft of 25 or 30 feet is going to be required, considerable expense along that line will be necessarily involved.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has there been any estimate along that line?

Mr. WALSH. None by the Navy that I know of.

Mr. NYE. O, Mr. President, on June 19 of last year the Munitions Committee submitted an extensive report carrying a very definite study made by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the Munitions Committee, setting forth what the cost would be in various fields of endeavor if the Government were to nationalize the munitions industry.

Mr. WALSH. Does that include the construction of naval vessels?

Mr. NYE. The estimate of additional capital that would be required by the Government if we were to produce all of our peacetime requirements of naval construction was about $24,000,000. The figure was a little less than that, as I now remember.

Mr. WALSH. That is for naval construction?

Mr. NYE. For naval construction.

Mr. WALSH. Was the Navy Department consulted? Did it make an estimate?

Mr. NYE. As I now recall the matter, the Navy Department did not undertake to make an estimate; but the attitude of the Navy Department all through the study was one of great opposition to the mere thought of the Government doing more than it was already doing in the way of naval construction.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator may be correct in that statement. I believe I sense that attitude, too; and I think they feel very deeply, sincerely, and honestly that it is necessary for this country in time of war to have the benefit of private building facilities as well as its own facilities for building naval craft. I know they feel strongly upon this subject, and I think their feeling is sincere and honest. I really do not think any objections they have to the Government carrying on this work are due to any sinister purpose or influence; but they really feel that private enterprise and private industry, particularly in the shipbuilding line, ought to be available to this country in time of war.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts how the time element of construction of the contemplated vessels would be affected if all of them were to be built in the present navy yards?

Mr. WALSH. If the amendment be adopted, it will postpone for several years the completion of the present naval program. In answer to the Senator, I will say there is a good deal of talk about our naval program being enlarged at the present time. It is not so. There is no expansion of our naval program at this time. No change whatever has been made from the provisions in the treaty we made with some of the great powers in reference to our naval strength; and with all we have planned and appropriated for, this country will not have until the year 1942 a Navy of the strength which our Government said, and other governments agreed, was necessary for our strength in time of peace—not in time of war.

Mr. TYDINGS. Parity.

Mr. WALSH. I refer to parity, as the Senator from Maryland mentioned. Parity will not be reached until 1942. If the proposed amendment shall be adopted, I do not know, and I do not know who else could know, when we could ever equal the number of vessels that were allotted us in the treaty.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand, the present arrangement of building half the ships in navy yards and half in private yards is of advantage to the country, aside from the value of the private yards in themselves, by reason of the fact that if we should be drawn into a war we should be able to call upon the private yards to build needed vessels. Is it not correct that from the standpoint of national defense it is necessary that we keep the maximum number of yards open, so that in any given emergency we can produce ships, if we are obliged to produce them, within a minimum of time?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. And if we were to build all these ships in private yards, it would mean a considerable delay in the completion of any naval program?

Mr. WALSH. There is no doubt about that. Furthermore, the Senate should remember that we have put in a restriction as to what profit private yards may make. By law, no private shipyard may retain or make more than 10 percent of profit in building our ships.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Massachusetts was in the Chamber at the time I called attention to the fact that my construction of the amendment would be, not that it would permit directly and affirmatively the construction in Government yards but because it places a limitation upon the funds, that it would simply prevent the use of these funds by the Government to carry out the provision of the law which provides that the building of ships shall be on a 50-50 basis. The result would be that none of the funds could be spent for building any ship in a private yard after the first one. The law requires that the ships be built alternately in private and public yards. The amendment, if adopted, would stop construction after the first ship is built.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator go so far as to say that would result, in his judgment, in closing down some of the Government navy yards?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; because under existing law the Department is required to build one destroyer in a Government yard, the next in a private yard, and the next one in a Government yard, and so forth. This amendment provides that no part of the fund shall be used for the purpose of building in private yards, and, therefore, the Department would be estopped from having any built in private yards. As the law requires the Department to build ships alternately in Government yards and private yards, it cannot build consecutively in the Government yards without violating the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell law, which is obligatory upon it. Therefore, the amendment, if adopted, would stop all construction except that of the first destroyer and the first submarine.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield first to the Senator from Washington, and then I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. BONE. I should like, in view of the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina, to ask the able Senator from Massachusetts, who is chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, and is an able parliamentarian, how long he thinks it would take in the emergency situation suggested by my good friend from South Carolina for the Senate and the House and the President, in conjunction with the Navy Department, always realizing the frightful position we are in, to pass a law correcting that situation? I suggest that it would take us but 1 day. We put the National Economy Act through in a few hours. In a great national emergency, and in view of the horrifying character of the situation suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, I am quite sure that the Congress would not find it difficult to act with celerity.

Mr. BYRNES. I think the answer is that it would take only so long as would be required by the Naval Affairs Committee to act on the measure of the Senator proposing to amend the law. The Senator from Washington now has a bill before that committee, and if he can have it reported now, why should he not have it reported? If he can have it reported under such circumstances, he ought to proceed now to have it reported.

Mr. BONE. That is precisely why I should like to have a vote on this amendment and see what the sentiment of the Senate is.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the President has the option of declaring whether a naval vessel shall be built in private yards or in Government navy yards?

Mr. WALSH. It has been developed during the debate this morning that the President has the final say and can decide, if he chooses, to build nearly all our naval craft in Government yards.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand that to be the law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the very ramifications of the subject which we have been discussing here, the differences of opinion, the magnitude of the question, the expense involved, its relationship to our whole policy of national defense, indicate, it seems to me, that we cannot deal with a question of this magnitude on an amendment offered on the floor to this appropriation bill. I hope the Senator from Washington will withdraw his amendment, or not press it, so that we may have the question discussed in the Naval Affairs Committee and finally in the Senate after the Senate possesses more complete information.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The question of nationalizing the manufacture of armament is one of the few upon which the Munitions Committee divided. I hold to the view that if we were completely to nationalize the production of defense facilities we would necessarily create such a magnitude of productive equipment and machinery, a magnitude equal to the maximum defense demands for any one moment, that we would virtually be committing our country to a permanent production speed in armament, because we all know, in the natural course of events, that there is always political pressure to keep every facility going at a hundred percent. Therefore I think that if we should have a 100-percent equipment it would be followed by a 100-percent pressure to keep the equipment in operation, and the final net result would be a devastating influence in behalf of maximum armaments instead of any hope for disarmament.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has made an admirable statement. In particular would that statement be true in regard to aircraft. We have delayed embarking the Government in building aircraft, and properly so. If war comes, we cannot prepare ourselves by overnight building of naval craft; it takes 2 years to build a battleship, and it takes almost as much time to build a cruiser. Aircraft, however, can be built within 90 days, and it is very essential that the Government encourage every private industry, located anywhere, to be equipped for building aircraft in time of war, so that in a few weeks we could build 15,000 or 20,000 or even 50,000 aircraft if needed. In the meantime we must appropriate money to have men trained to man these ships and take care of them, for it takes a year to train a man to be a pilot and to have the necessary knowledge of gunnery.

Mr. BONE. At this point I should like to ask the Senator, in view of the fact of the pressing need for aircraft development and a more thorough understanding of the problems that inhere in aircraft, why the Navy Department comes down here with a proposal in this bill to destroy the aircraft factory at Philadelphia? In view of the Senator's statement, which I think is absolutely correct, why should the Navy Department want to destroy that infant?

Mr. WALSH. As I understand, that action was taken by the House and not by the Senate committee.

Mr. BYRNES. That has been corrected in the bill as reported to the Senate. The Senator from Washington is entirely in accord with the action of the committee in that respect. I do not think he wants that provision of the bill as reported to the Senate defeated.

Mr. BONE. I am very happy to state that I am entirely in accord with the conclusion of the committee in striking out the provision regarding the factory in Philadelphia. I think that factory ought to be expanded.

Mr. WALSH. It is gratifying to find the Senator from Washington and the Senator from South Carolina in accord on at least one provision of this bill.

Mr. President, I do not care to prolong the discussion further. I trust the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate for more than a few moments on the pending amendment, and yet I believe I shall desire at the same time to speak my mind concerning the bill in its entirety.

The armament race in which at the present time the world is engaging in the name of preparation for more war must to everyone who will give a second's thought to what is occurring be a matter of grave moment. I think it is fair to say that never yet has an armament race been followed by peace, and when we know that there never has been an armament race compared with the one upon which nations have now entered, there is little or no consolation to be found in the actual tramp, tramp, tramp which resounds throughout the world today. As for ourselves, I think there is not a power upon earth that would not give millions, indeed hundreds of millions, and perhaps billions of dollars, if it could have what we have in the way of a national defense created by nature that is costing the United States not a penny. I think there is no power on the face of the earth so little subject to attack as is our Nation, and no nation need fear attack so little as we of the United States do. Yet we find ourselves very much a party to the present-day armament race.

I have made up my mind as to where the difficulty is. It arises largely out of the fact that we have not a well-defined national-defense policy. We are all believers in maintaining an adequate national defense, but that term lends itself to so many descriptions, so many definitions, that we in the Senate find ourselves, for example, at loggerheads as to what constitutes an adequate national defense. We know it to be true that 20 years ago certain forces were complaining about the inadequacy of our national defense. Today we are spending, in the name of national defense, between three and four times more than we were spending 20 years ago, and yet those who then were complaining about the inadequacy of our national defense are among those who today are increasing their complaints about the inadequacy of our national defense. It comes down to the point that with some interests, some forces, the call for national defense has no specific goal in mind; the call of some people in the name of national defense is for more and more and ever more, and no one knows what the end of that demand is going to be.

Today the United States is spending approximately $20,000,000 a week in the name of national defense, and yet among us are many who feel that our national defense is all too inadequate. We have listened to a debate here today which reveals that the pending naval appropriation bill is not particularly a construction bill, and that but a very small part of it enters into new construction, which drives us to the conclusion, then, that for all time to come, not counting any enlargements of our Military Establishment, we are going to have an outlay annually at least on a par with that being called for this year.

The sum of $20,000,000 a week for national defense is to be expended at a time when in many communities and in many States there is wonderment that more money is not available to meet the very necessary needs that are arising by reason of economic adversities and emergencies.

Here in Congress we have spent days quibbling about what we ought to permit in the way of an outlay to meet the human needs of our own people, but there always seems to be just a little resentment if any delay whatever is occasioned in the passage of so-called national-defense appropriations.

In our plans of effecting economy, in our plans of establishing a reorganization of governmental units, much consideration has been given by those who have directed their attention to the subject of consolidating the various departments and agencies of the Government. But very few, if any, have been the suggestions which for a moment would tolerate the idea of reorganizing our Military Establishment on such a basis as would bring the Army and the Navy under one head, a head of national defense.

Looking now at the very able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], whose leadership on the Foreign Relations Committee this year has accomplished so much progress in the way of determining America's course in the future, I recall how we have been developing here at home a determination on our own part that we are going to stay at home in the future and do our fighting here, if it is at all possible to do so; that we have seen the end of that day when it can be expected that the United States will quickly follow off into other people's wars, certainly not until there can be better cause than there has been in the past, certainly not until there can be better promise of a chance, after it has won the war, for the United States to win what it goes out to win.

Our difficulty, it seems to me, lies in the fact, as I have said, that we are lacking a clear defining of what we mean by "national defense"; we are lacking in a national-defense policy.

We are not much alarmed about any possible attack upon us by a foreign foe. We are told upon occasion that from this country or that country there is some danger of attack, but when we make inquiry and ascertain the facts we find the people of such country are looking upon us as being more likely to attack them.

We find in this country occasionally developed a large suspicion when stories are circulated about fishing vessels of another nation surrounding our naval craft when they can, eyeing them with suspicion, and photographing them. That throws us into a state of fear that we are being spied upon and that a certain nation has its eyes set upon ways of demolishing our Navy. In the country to which I refer, without naming it, people tell with equal conviction of how Americans are spying upon the naval craft of their nation. We find ourselves building, through our fears and our suspicions, a state of mind that is never going to permit a reduction of the budgets which constitute so burdensome an obligation upon us, a burden that is increasing from year to year.

If we could have a well-defined national-defense policy, and if its definition were to be in keeping with what I take to be the desire of the American people today, I am satisfied we could have a national defense for hundreds of millions of dollars less than is occasioned by the Budget which has been laid before us annually. If we could have defined strictly what we mean by national defense, in addition to serving our needs in the way of economy, we would succeed in giving word to the rest of the world of an intent on our part to do our fighting at home, of an intent on our part to so conduct ourselves in a military way that other nations would not in their national-defense plans ever contemplate an attack from us.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], pending before the Senate at the present time, is one which I should like to see have the concurrence of the Senate. I think if the Government itself were to perform all its naval construction work, we would thereby take a first step in eliminating the most powerful influences which are at work keeping the American mind dissatisfied concerning the adequacy of its national defense.

Through the conduct of an investigation running over 2 years the Senate Munitions Committee ascertained some of the influences which were at work, some of the powerful urgings that had America moving in directions which were not, strictly speaking, the directions which the masses of the people wanted pursued. There can be no denying that the motive of profit plays quite as large a part in programs involving preparation for war as it plays in programs incident to the actual waging of war. The motive of profit is known to cause men and institutions the world over to engage in programs which have anything but the peace of the world in mind.

I am not going to burden the Senate with an extended review of the findings of the practices of the private munitions industry and especially those engaged in the shipbuilding end of the industry. However, I desire to read to the Senate a summary which appeared in the report of the committee to the Senate, to be found at page 6 of report no. 1 submitted to the Senate in June 1935, as follows:

The committee finds that three big shipbuilding companies had $53,744,000 of work at stake in the Geneva Disarmament Conference which the Navy had given to them a few months before the opening of the conference in 1927. It notes the admitted interest of the companies in the unfavorable outcome of that conference. It notes Mr. Shearer's testimony that he was urged to go to the conference by Admiral Pratt and was supplied with secret Navy information. It notes the secrecy of his employment by the shipbuilders and the explanation for that secrecy. It notes his activities in the promotion of a war scare with England in 1928 and 1929 while being paid by the shipbuilders. It notes certain discrepancies between testimony given by the shipbuilders at the Shortridge hearings and the hearings of the Munitions Committee. It notes Mr. Shearer's claim that "as a result of my activities, eight 10,000-ton cruisers are under construction." Further, that owing to the failure of the tri-power naval conference at Geneva, there is now before the Seventieth Congress a 71-ship building program costing $740,000,000. It notes Mr. Shearer's further testimony of his activities at the request of various naval officials. It notes his description of his Geneva campaign as "fast and vicious." It notes his report of the "delight" of the shipbuilders at the result. It notes the payment by the shipbuilders of the costs of a pamphlet he wrote attacking certain private citizens, including Newton D. Baker and Franklin D. Roosevelt. It notes the payments he received from Mr. Hearst of $5,000 in 1929. It notes the spreading through a friendly newspaper syndicate of an alarmist story concerning alleged Japanese intentions by the president of the Bath Iron Works, with the intent and result of activity by a Senator and Representatives from Maine in connection with an appropriation bill in 1932.

The committee finds, on the basis of this and other testimony, that there is a clear and definite danger in allowing self-interested groups, such as the shipbuilders and their allied interests, to be in the close position of influence, as they are at present, to such an important instrument of national policy as the Navy is and the danger in allowing them to remain in a position where it is to their financial interest to confuse public opinion between the needs of the country for a purely defensive Navy and their own continued needs for profits.

The committee finds further that there has been a large amount of bipartisan political activity on the part of the shipbuilders locally, in Congress, and also at the national headquarters of the two parties. It makes no claim to have gone into this field thoroughly.

The committee notes the claims of the Washington representative of United Drydocks in 1934 that he could get a bill through Congress for $50,000, and that "there is no virtue in being quixotic at this state." It notes the placing of Congressmen on certain committees at the request of the shipbuilders. It notes their claim to have helped the Navy on certain bills and to have elected members of the House Rules Committee. It notes the reference to United Drydock Co. securing through Dave Hogan, secretary to Mr. McCooey, prominent Brooklyn Democrat, the award of $6,800,000 in destroyers in 1933.

The committee finds that the matter of national defense should be above and separated from lobbying and the use of political influence by self-interested groups and that it has not been above or separated from either of them.

The committee finds further under this head that the main lobby for the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 was conducted by the shipbuilders under the leadership of Mr. Laurence B. Wilder, then president of American Brown Boveri (New York Shipbuilding Co.), and that a sum of over $140,000 was spent in putting that bill over.

The committee finds further that New York Shipbuilding Co. was acquired as a speculative investment by the Bragg-Smith-Cord interests just prior to the 1933 naval awards. * * *

The success of the shipbuilders in securing an allocation of $238,000,000 for shipbuilding from P. W. A. funds has been their most recent demonstration of power. In this their purpose was aided by labor groups, who later, when the expected employment failed to materialize, spoke of the matter as a "double cross" to the Navy officials who had solicited their support for the measure.

Mr. President, one cannot view what is known and a matter of record concerning the activities of the private shipbuilding industry without knowing that there is large ground and real cause for such an amendment as that offered by the Senator from Washington. If one desired to go back to the period of the war to find what those upon whom we count so largely in time of war really did when their Government called upon them to utilize their facilities and give all their service to their country in the full measure which was needed, he would know how utterly disgraceful was the course of private industry. Their action then was not merely a matter for the moment, it was such as ought to invite today from the Congress of the United States anything but encouragement, anything but aid and comfort; and aid and comfort is to be found in far too large a measure in the military appropriations which we are passing from time to time.

With the Senator from Washington, I hope there may be a record vote upon the amendment he has offered.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], I desire to call the attention of the Senate to an amendment which was suggested when this bill was before the House of Representatives. Representative FISH then suggested this amendment:

That the President is authorized and requested to invite such governments as he may deem necessary or expedient to send representatives to a conference at Washington or elsewhere to consider the limitation of naval armaments, for the purpose of reaching an agreement on a program to limit naval armaments, with special reference to the limitation of battleships, battle cruisers, light cruisers, aircraft carriers, destroyers, submarines, and aircraft.

Mr. FISH called attention to the fact that this amendment was not germane to the legislation pending before the House, and he therefore did not actually offer it; and I assume, of course, that the same rule applies here, and that such an amendment would not be germane.

In the course of the discussion in the House this interesting statement was made:

A naval conference should be called immediately, to be held either here or elsewhere, because Japan and England have already stated—England through Mr. Chamberlain, its Chancelor of the Exchequer, and Japan through the head of its Navy Department—that they are willing to enter into such a conference right now. I could read what these governments have said in the last few days if I had time.

I should have been interested if Representative FISH had actually read what the representatives of these governments said, and had given us the authority for his statement that they are ready to consider a limitation of armaments.

Mr. President, the naval limitation treaty which was adopted as the result of the Washington Conference has now expired. I think no one statement is made more often than that there is now underway an armament race. The President himself has referred to it. The Secretary of State has called attention to it. I think it is recognized, as was stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], that such a race contains the greatest threat to the peace of the world.

Before the Washington Conference, in 1921 and 1922, a similar condition existed. At that time, by reason of the fact that we were headed for an armament race, the Washington Conference was held. I think anyone who is fair will realize that a great deal was accomplished as a result of that conference.

I will read a statement written by Mr. Philip Whitwell Wilson, contained in the American Encyclopedia, which I think fairly sums up the result of that conference. It will be recalled that the treaty provided that the naval tonnage of the United States should be limited to 525,000 tons; that Great Britain should also be limited to 525,000 tons; that Japan should be limited to 315,000 tons; France to 175,000 tons; and Italy to 175,000 tons. The well-know ratio of 5–5–3 was there adopted. Of a result of that conference, this, it seems to me, is a fair summary:

Summing up the results of the Washington Conference, we may say that it cleared the air in the Far East of much inflammatory poison, greatly improving relations between the United States and Japan. It stopped the naval race—

I ask that that statement be especially noted:

It stopped the naval race between the United States and Japan, and furnished Great Britain with a convenient escape both from her Anglo-Japanese alliance and her traditional, but now imposible, command of the ocean. It restored Shantung to China, and Siberia to Russia. Its influence over Japan has been liberal and beneficial, and is reflected in some reduction of Japan's Army.

Mr. President, it seems to me no one can challenge the beneficial results of the Washington Conference. The reason why I now call it to the attention of the Senate is that the treaty which resulted from the conference has expired, and there is no limitation upon any nation in building naval armaments. That being true, it seems to me timely, at any rate, to call the attention of the Secretary of State and of the President to the subject, and to remind them of the importance of having at an early time a conference to limit naval armaments.

I have great confidence in both the President and the Secretary of State. I believe they are entirely aware of the serious importance of this naval race. I also believe they are watching for the opportunity to join other nations in limiting their naval building programs for the future.

I also am interested in a resolution which Representative FISH has introduced, calling for a conference of the signatories of the Kellogg-Briand Pact to consider some machinery for implementing the pact.

It will be remembered that some years ago, when that pact was adopted, there was a great deal of optimism that somehow the nations of the world would cooperate through it to end war. As a matter of fact, in the only test to which the Kellogg-Briand Pact has been subjected, it proved utterly futile. The Secretary of State called the attention of Italy and of other nations to its existence last year, but nothing was done. It is a perfectly futile instrument; and unless it can be implemented, unless some instrumentality can be established to make it workable, it would have been just as well if it never had been ratified by 61 or more nations of the earth.

I simply desire to commend the Representative who introduced this resolution and who suggested this amendment for consideration when the naval bill was before the House. I desire to join with him in calling the matter to the attention of our officials, in order that we may not go on everlastingly without any limitation upon this race in armament. It seems to me that unless something of that kind is done, we are headed toward very disastrous consequences as a result of the naval building program in this country and in the other countries of the world.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Senator understands that this Government has not gone beyond the limitations set in the disarmament treaties; but I assume the Senator has in mind that, unless some action be taken, we may have to follow the example of other countries which appear to be about to engage in a naval armament race.

Mr. POPE. I understand that. I think our Government is to be commended for staying within the terms of the treaty. I am glad to note that the present Navy bill is less in amount than that of last year. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that without any limitation for the future this country is or will be compelled to engage in an armament race. It will be compelled to go beyond any provision of the Washington Treaty in order to defend itself, at least in the opinion of our naval authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Burke	George	La Follette
Andrews	Byrd	Gerry	Lee
Austin	Byrnes	Gibson	Lodge
Bachman	Capper	Gillette	Logan
Bankhead	Caraway	Green	Lonergan
Barkley	Chavez	Guffey	Lundeen
Bilbo	Clark	Hale	McAdoo
Black	Connally	Hatch	McGill
Bone	Copeland	Hayden	McKellar
Borah	Davis	Herring	McNary
Bridges	Dieterich	Holt	Minton
Brown, Mich.	Duffy	Hughes	Moore
Brown, N. H.	Ellender	Johnson, Calif.	Murray
Bulow	Frazier	Johnson, Colo.	Neely
Nye	Radcliffe	Schwellenbach	Tydings
O'Mahoney	Reynolds	Sheppard	Vandenberg
Overton	Robinson	Steiwer	Wagner
Pittman	Russell	Thomas, Utah	Walsh
Pope	Schwartz	Townsend	White

Mr. MINTON. I desire to reannounce the absence of Senators indicated on the previous roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

Mr. BONE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to the provision in the bill on page 25, line 13, and the next two or three lines, for the appropriation of the sum of $10,000,000, which was the amount appropriated by the Congress in 1935 for the construction of a floating drydock to be constructed on the Pacific coast for use at Pearl Harbor. Under the provisions of the bill as it now reads, this $10,000,000 which has been previously appropriated for that purpose is taken away from that purpose, and is reappropriated for the purpose of the payment of personnel.

As I read this provision, naturally it struck me that it might be construed to be a statement of the Congress that it intended to abandon the effort to build this floating drydock. As I indicated a few minutes ago in the course of the question which I submitted to my colleague, the bid which was received for the construction of this floating drydock from a private shipbuilder, the Bethlehem Steel Co., was some $21,000,000. The Navy Department has not made public the exact figures of the estimate by the Bremerton yard and the Mare Island yard, but the indication is that they run somewhere around $16,000,000. The Navy Department has asked the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives to increase the authorization for the amount of this floating drydock, and that matter is, as I understand, before the Bureau of the Budget at this time.

I have prepared an amendment, to strike out on page 25, line 13, the figures "$78,484,680" and to insert in lieu thereof the figures "$88,484,680", and then to strike out commencing with the word "and" on line 13 down to and including the word "paragraph" on line 17.

If it is the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to have the bill construed to indicate the abandonment, so far as the Congress is concerned, of the floating drydock construction, I will present the amendment and ask for action upon it. If I may receive assurance of the Senator from South Carolina that it is not the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations to bring about an abandonment of that project, but that it is the intention of the committee simply to have this fund, which is now lying idle, put to use during the period of time while we are waiting for an authorization for a larger amount, and that the Committee on Appropriations, so far as it is now concerned, will treat with favorable consideration the action of the Navy Department if they ask for a larger appropriation for the floating drydock, then I will not submit the amendment. I am making this statement for the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, there is no justification for the construction of the action of the committee as an abandonment of this project. The fact is that the authorization for the drydock, as the Senator from Washington has stated, was $10,000,000. When bids were asked for the completion of the project the private bid was in excess of $21,000,000, and for a bare dock, without pumping equipment and other essential and desirable equipment, it was $16,000,000. The Navy Department could not proceed with the construction because the bid was in excess of the authorization.

The Department has presented to the legislative committee, or is about to present, the estimate for an authorization of an amount sufficient to build the drydock. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate did not pass upon the matter for the reason that no estimate was submitted or could be submitted in the absence of the necessary legislation. Therefore there could be no justification for construing the action of the committee in transferring the $10,000,000 as an intention on the part of the committee to oppose the construction of the drydock. As the Senator has indicated in his remarks, it was simply making provision for the use of the $10,000,000 until such time as the Congress would authorize the construction at a cost which would permit the Department to go ahead with the construction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 14, line 23, after the words "more than", it is proposed to strike out "nineteen" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty."

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I offer this amendment at the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I am willing that the amendment be adopted and go to conference, where an opportunity will be afforded to determine its exact effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina, in charge of the bill, concerning certain language in the bill. Beginning in line 19, on page 29, is this language:

Rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same.

What is the meaning of that? Is it as mysterious as it sounds?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think the Senator is in a facetious humor. That phrase is one which has been put into these bills year after year, and, as I understand, has no application to anything except the place where the troops are gathered. The provision is for the rent of the place and the expense of maintaining it. The rendezvous is the place where the men are gathered. That language has appeared in these bills year after year. If the Senator objects to it, I am willing to accept an amendment to strike it out.

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President; but, quite seriously, the rendezvous is the recruiting place, is it not?

Mr. BYRNES. That is, as is always understood, what the general language has reference to. As the Senator will notice, the language is:

Apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation; expenses of recruiting for the naval service.

It is for the expense incident to keeping up the place where the recruits are gathered before being sent to one of the training stations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FRAZIER. On the passage of the bill I call for the yeas and nays. The people ought to know how the Senate stands on so important a bill, calling for an appropriation of over $500,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand seconded? [A pause.] Not a sufficient number have seconded the demand, and the yeas and nays are not ordered.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I expected that would be the result, and if it had not been for one or two Senators——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BYRNES. I join with the Senator from North Dakota in demanding the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I appreciate that action on the part of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from South Carolina. If it had not been for the action of one or two Senators on the floor Friday afternoon, the bill providing for an appropriation of more than $500,000,000 would have been disposed of without any explanation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MINTON (when Mr. GLASS' name was called). I announce the general pair of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. LONERGAN (when Mr. MALONEY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MALONEY] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea" on this question, and the Senator from Utah would vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). Upon this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore I shall vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are detained from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained in an important meeting of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are absent attending to important matters in the various Government departments.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are detained on important public business.

Mr. BULOW. I announce that my colleague the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is detained from the Senate because of illness in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 64, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—64

Adams	Chavez	Herring	Overton
Andrews	Connally	Hughes	Pope
Austin	Copeland	Johnson, Calif.	Radcliffe
Bachman	Davis	Lee	Reynolds
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lodge	Robinson

So the bill (H. R. 5232) was passed.

Mr. BAILEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to announce that I was absent when the roll was called on the naval appropriation bill. If present, I should have voted "yea."

ELIGIBILITY OF JOSEPH P. KENNEDY FOR MARITIME COMMISSION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, out of order, I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, and I ask to have it read, with the intention of requesting unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 110) limiting the operation of section 201 (b) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, with respect to qualification of member of the United States Maritime Commission, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appointment of Joseph P. Kennedy as a member of the United States Maritime Commission and his service on said Commission shall not be deemed to be in violation of the provisions of section 201 (b) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, approved June 29, 1936, notwithstanding any pecuniary interest he may now have or may have had within 3 years prior to his appointment in any carrier by water, shipbuilder, contractor, or other firm or corporation or in any person who derives a substantial portion of his revenue from any business associated with ships or shipping.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. In explanation of the measure, I will state that, under a provision contained in the maritime act of last year, the act approved June 29, 1936, a question has arisen as to the eligibility of Mr. Kennedy to receive the appointment as chairman of the Commission because of his alleged ownership of a limited amount of stock in certain corporations, which ownership may be construed to be in possible violation of the terms of the act.

Mr. Kennedy is the former chairman of the National Securities Exchange Commission. He is a gentleman of notable business ability and broad experience. I find that Senators who assisted in drafting the Maritime Act are willing—indeed, many of them are anxious—that Mr. Kennedy serve. It is my opinion that he would not desire to do so with a cloud upon his title such as might exist should the joint resolution offered by me, or some similar measure, be not passed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I think it is only fair to point out that the fact of Mr. Kennedy's ownership of stock in the Todd Shipbuilding Co., to be exact, was called to the attention of the President and of the Commerce Committee of the Senate by Mr. Kennedy himself. So far as the direct ownership of the 1,100 shares of the Todd Shipbuilding Co. stock is concerned, that matter was submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, who rendered an opinion to the effect that, in his judgment, the ownership of the 1,100 shares did not amount to a substantial interest within the meaning of the law. Subsequently, however, Mr. Kennedy called the attention of the Commerce Committee to the fact—it being his intention, I may say, to dispose of the 1,100 shares mentioned of the Todd Shipbuilding Co.—that he had established some years ago an irrevocable trust for the benefit of his children, of which he now has no control, but which does own a certain amount of stock of the Todd Shipbuilding Co. He also has a mortgage on a small ship, given him voluntarily to secure a personal loan which he had made to his brother-in-law. I may say that, in my opinion, neither of these circumstances would amount to a disqualification within the meaning of the law, but, in view of the very scrupulous attitude which Mr. Kennedy himself has assumed, and because of the desire on the part of all concerned, so far as I am advised, and in view of Mr. Kennedy's outstanding qualifications for the position, I think it would be a most excellent thing to have the joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Arkansas passed.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I desire the floor in my own right.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. Then I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Commerce Committee has been embarrassed by this matter, and particularly so because of Mr. Kennedy's own anxiety to let it be known to all the world what the situation is. Under date of March 12 he wrote me, saying:

The restrictions of the law as to qualifications are so far-reaching that I was quite concerned about my eligibility.

Then he recites the reasons, referring to his stock holding, which has just been mentioned by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. President, I think I am correct in saying that there is perfect unanimity on the part of the Committee on Commerce that the selection of Mr. Kennedy was a wise one, a happy one, that he will carry to the office a degree of ability which the office demands.

The appointments of members of the Maritime Commission have been delayed for about 8 months since the passage of the bill. During that time we have had no permanent Commission. Many matters of the greatest import are awaiting the Commission and it is very necessary that there should be early action. I take it that if this joint resolution shall be passed, Mr. Kennedy's name will then be before the Committee on Commerce without prejudice; but, of course, the passage of the joint resolution will not serve as a confirmation of Mr. Kennedy's appointment for this position.

I hope the Senate may deem it wise to pass the joint resolution. I was not advised of it until a few moments ago, and was not a party to it in any way, but I myself am convinced that if the President had gone over the entire United States to find a man to head the Maritime Commission he could not have found a better one than Mr. Kennedy.

Mr. Kennedy takes the place, if he takes it at all, very reluctantly. He has large affairs of his own and will make a sacrifice in order to render this service. If he shall do so, it will be in order to render a public service. I trust my friend from Oregon will see fit to allow the joint resolution to be considered and passed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, unquestionably Mr. Kennedy is an able financier and a fine executive. I shall oppose the proposition submitted by the Senator from Arkansas without in any sense meaning to reflect at all upon the great ability of Mr. Kennedy. It is a most unusual request. With the long experience I have had in the Senate, I do not recall its parallel. The Senate Committee on Commerce has before it the names of five members of the Maritime Commission. Mr. Kennedy's name, like that of Abou Ben Adhem, "led all the rest." Then came a letter from Mr. Kennedy, stating that he was of the opinion that he was disqualified until he could dispose of his stock. He says he does not wish to undertake the service until he has ample and reasonable opportunity to sell the stock in the Todd Shipbuilding Co. It is a frank and sincere statement. I want to see him accorded that opportunity, and he shall be.

Mr. President, the Commerce Committee of the Senate has jurisdiction over this matter. It must pass upon the qualifications of the gentlemen who have been nominated as commissioners, and must report to the Senate conformably to a rule which is ancient in the practices of this body. Here we are attempting to take away from the Commerce Committee the opportunity to pass an opinion which it must eventually render upon the qualifications of Mr. Kennedy. It is an attempt by the Senate to prejudge the situation without having anything before it. It is an attempt upon the part of the Senate to take away the jurisdiction of the Commerce Committee and bring the nomination here and rush it through in the form of a joint resolution. It is unthinkable and unheard of.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator quite means that.

Mr. McNARY. I mean everything I have said.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the purposes of the joint resolution, if passed, would but indicate that the Congress is willing that the Commerce Committee should consider the name of Mr. Kennedy in spite of the fact that he holds certain shares of stock. I do not think the power of the committee is to be limited in the least. When the matter goes back to the committee my feeling, as chairman of the committee, is that we must still determine whether we will recommend Mr. Kennedy for confirmation.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the generous attitude of the Senator from New York. Mr. Kennedy is his constituent. I admire his great legal ability. I am sure the Commerce Committee is capable of passing upon the very question it is now attempting to have the Senate pass upon without any data or information before it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McNARY. Gladly.

Mr. COPELAND. I never saw Mr. Kennedy in my life. My position in the matter has no relation to the fact that he is one of my constituents. I do not know whether or not he voted for me. He is such a wise man I doubt if he did, but that has nothing to do with it. I know my own feeling is that Mr. Kennedy has demonstrated such remarkable ability that I should like to see him placed at the head of the Maritime Commission where we all know ability is needed. That is the reason why I favor the joint resolution. If he lived in Oregon, I should be just as enthusiastically for him.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that. I did not intend the Senator from New York to become serious about the matter. It was only a pleasant passing remark upon my part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas for immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have not concluded my remarks.

The Commerce Committee, having jurisdiction over this matter, must pass upon the qualifications of the five gentlemen who have been named to the Commission and submit a report to the Senate. One of the things for the committee to consider and ponder is whether Mr. Kennedy comes within the provisions of the act creating the Commission. It is true that the Attorney General has rendered an opinion, which is before the committee, approving the qualifications of Mr. Kennedy. He may be qualified. I am not discussing that. He is qualified from the standpoint of experience and ability. He may be disqualified by reason of ownership which runs counter to some of the provisions of the Maritime Act.

No aid could be given the Commerce Committee by action at this time. What is proposed would constitute a precedent without a parallel. I shall object, and when the matter comes again before the Commerce Committee we shall take it up and consider it and report to the Senate upon Mr. Kennedy, along with the other members who have been nominated by the President to be members of the Maritime Commission.

In passing I ought to refer to a matter which I have had in mind and which does not influence me in the immediate case. I expect eventually to support the confirmation of Mr. Kennedy's nomination; but of the five commissioners appointed to serve on the Maritime Commission, not a member proposed comes from the Pacific coast, which has the longest coast line of any section of the country. I recall when the Maritime Commission was created, instead of placing in the measure the geographical description which was formerly found in acts of a similar nature, the statement was made that the President would deal fairly with each section of the country. This is the first opportunity I have had to state that we have not been treated fairly in the matter, and, while that does not enter into the question involved in this particular case, it may in some other case.

Mr. President, I conclude by announcing again that I emphatically object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, before the matter is finally passed over, let me point out that if the services of Mr. Kennedy are to be availed of, it will probably be necessary to pass the joint resolution.

There is a provision in the law to the effect that if anyone has owned an interest in a shipbuilding concern or in ships within 3 years before the time of his appointment, he thereby becomes ineligible. As stated by the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], an opinion has been rendered to the effect that this does not make Mr. Kennedy ineligible; but Mr. Kennedy is in doubt about the matter. Members of the Commerce Committee are in doubt about the subject. I, myself, feel that a question is involved as to his eligibility.

The joint resolution does not in any sense interfere with the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce to pass upon the nomination. As stated by the able Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], it simply removes a question of doubt as to their right to consider the nomination favorably.

It has been said, I think, during the course of the discussion that Mr. Kennedy did not seek this position; that he never asked for the appointment. He was tendered the appointment because the appointing power felt that he was an able and good man, well qualified to perform the functions of the office.

After his appointment Mr. Kennedy himself, evidently having doubt as to his eligibility under a technical construction of the statute, brought the subject to the attention of the Commerce Committee and told them of the securities he owned, told them of the existence of the trust referred to by the Senator from Missouri, and also mentioned one or two other small property interests which relatives had, and perhaps another which he himself had, in concerns which are related to the shipbuilding industry.

This was commendable action on his part. The only course that I see that can be taken to permit consideration of his nomination is some such action as that which is proposed in the joint resolution.

As stated by the Senator from New York, quite a long time has already elapsed since the original bill was passed and since the necessity arose for the administration of its provisions.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. In line with what the Senator from Arkansas has said as to the necessity or desirability for the commission immediately to begin functioning, and particularly in view of the Senator's statement, with which I probably agree, that it will probably be necessary to pass such a joint resolution as the one now pending, I simply desire to call attention to the very great and pressing necessity in the matter due to the fact that the commission is confronted by two deadlines.

By the terms of the act itself, at a day certain, I believe April 30, or before that day certain, the commission must pass upon the question of personnel, because the personnel in office at that time, at the effective date, will be automatically converted into the civil service, and if it is desired to make any changes in personnel prior to conversion into the civil service, it will be necessary for the commission to begin operations at the earliest practicable date.

Also under the terms of the act it is necessary for the commission to negotiate new contracts for the carrying of mails and operation of ships, or to adjust old contracts on or before June 30 of the present year. It seems to me, in view of the fact that they must organize and pass upon all these exceedingly important questions, the commission has little enough time even now to effect the necessary decisions.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. As I recall, the organic act creating a Maritime Commission of five members was passed in May 1936. Today is the 22d of March 1937. Why the present haste, when the President of the United States has had nine and a half months in which to act, without taking action?

Treating Mr. Kennedy's case as not the case of the commission, the names of the commissioners are now before the Commerce Committee. Let us bring them all down here, and then the Senate can pass upon the qualifications of Mr. Kennedy as applied to the state of facts brought to the attention of the Commerce Committee. We do not need any amendment of the organic act. The nomination simply brings up the question whether Mr. Kennedy's holdings are substantial and whether they come within the provisions of the act.

I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that merely bringing the names before the Senate on a favorable report will raise the question. If it does not do so, then the Senator had better have his joint resolution to amend the act referred to the Commerce Committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I fully agree with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] that it is very strange that 9 months have elapsed since the bill became a law without the appointment of the members of the commission. I have fretted about the matter for a long time; but that does not absolve me as a Member of the Senate from taking as early action as I can after the nominations reach us. I am not going to fall back on the deliquency and failure of the White House to act as a defense for my failing to act. I think it is very vitally important that the Maritime Commission should be appointed and made to function, because otherwise we shall be in great distress.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES. With reference to what has been said by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], I only wish to say that I cannot indulge in any criticism of the White House because of the delay. If a delay of a few months can result in the selection of men like Mr. Kennedy, I hope there will be more delay in the selection of other appointees hereafter. The members of the Banking and Currency Committee and the members of the Appropriations Committee, who are in position to know the service rendered by Mr. Kennedy as Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, know that during many years we have not been so fortunate as to have a more efficient public servant than Mr. Joseph Kennedy; and if the action of the Senate can straighten out the matter so as to enable him to accept this position, I hope such action will be taken.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as I stated earlier in my remarks, the act was approved June 29, 1936. Great difficulty has been encountered in finding men who are eligible and who are capable of carrying on the work of this very important commission. Delay has already occurred. No divestiture of his holdings would relieve Mr. Kennedy from possible criticism of ineligibility under the original act, because the act provides that no one shall be eligible who held securities of the character already described and well understood within 3 years before the time of his appointment; so that if Mr. Kennedy should sell or give away every interest he has that would not affect the question of his eligibility.

As I see the matter, it is solely an issue as to whether Senators desire the services of Mr. Kennedy. He feels that he ought not to be expected to run the gantlet of attack here on the ground of ineligibility when he has frankly stated the circumstances and conditions which surround that question.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. In line with the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President acted quite promptly; and in the month of September or early October of last year he advised my predecessor, the late Senator James Couzens, that he wished him to accept the place as Chairman of the Maritime Commission. Of course, the unfortunate passing of Senator Couzens caused some further delay.

I may say in that connection that, of course, I regret that the area which I in part represent—the Great Lakes area—is not represented upon the commission; but I wish to call attention to the fact that the President acted promptly under the circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON. Another question which has been raised, I think, by the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], relates to the action of the committee. He seems to have proceeded on the theory that the committee is under obligation to report all names at one time. It frequently happens in cases of this character that some names are reported and others are held for further consideration. The committee may act upon this nomination at any time that it chooses.

If the Senator persists in his opposition to the consideration of the joint resolution—and, of course, he has the power and the right to do so, because it has not been considered by a standing committee of the Senate—I can and will ask a reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Commerce. I can and will and do ask the committee, in the event it becomes necessary to do so, to give prompt consideration to the joint resolution, and to report it, if practicable, at the next session of the Senate, when, the day following that, I may be able, or some member of the committee may be able, to move the consideration of the joint resolution, which motion will be determined not by a single objection but by a majority vote.

I understood my friend the Senator from Oregon to announce that he would not consent to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. McNARY. I think I made that very clear; and I am glad the Senator from Arkansas has followed my advice, and has now requested the reference of the joint resolution to the Commerce Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I have not yet done so.

Mr. McNARY. I am quite sure the Senator will do so before the day is over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, of course any one Senator may object to the consideration of a joint resolution when it is introduced. I did not need the advice of the Senator from Oregon—although I always appreciate it—to inform me of that fact; and I did not need the information that if the joint resolution goes to a committee and is reported by the committee, the Senate one day later at its will may then proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be so referred.

EXTENSION AND COMPLETION OF THE CAPITOL

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, my information is that later on the Senator from Arkansas will make a motion that the Senate take a recess until next Thursday. Therefore at this juncture I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1170, so as to make it the unfinished business for consideration when the Senate meets again.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask to have the title of the bill stated before the request is acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the title of the bill.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 1170) to provide for the extension and completion of the United States Capitol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Texas does not desire to proceed with the consideration of the bill today. Believing that consideration should be promptly had of the joint resolution which was introduced a few moments ago, it is my intention to move an adjournment of the Senate until tomorrow; and then the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the pending bill, and the Committee on Commerce may have an opportunity to report tomorrow, if it chooses to do so.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations in the Army, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Guy K. Bard to be United States attorney, eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Andrew C. Pickens to be Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, with the rank of rear admiral.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William G. Du Bose to be Chief Constructor and Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair with the rank of rear admiral.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotions in the Regular Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Army are confirmed en bloc. That concludes the Executive Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 23, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 22, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness and for His wonderful works to the children of men. The Lord Jehovah liveth. The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree and shall spread abroad like the cedar of Lebanon.

Arouse, O Lord, in our land that conscience that saves from the clutch of selfishness, sin, and rebellion. We entreat Thee to break through the deep vault of every section until they are powerless against the majesty of righteousness, justice, and truth. Make our national life clear and benevolent, that all problems may be worked out in the calmness of brotherhood and cooperation. In this, the Passion Week of our Lord, we would tarry in Galilee. We would walk with the Master, hear His warnings, heed His entreaties; we would confess Him at the throne of eternal love and follow Him until daybreak in the garden, and Thine shall be the glory forever. Heavenly Father, preserve the health of our President and clothe him with great wisdom; do Thou sustain the health and strength of our most brotherly Speaker and all Members of this Chamber. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 19, 1937, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 328. An act for the relief of the estate of Letha F. McCubbin, the estate of Mary B. Hodge, and the estate of Walter H. Mansfield;

H. R. 1231. An act for the relief of John Munroe;

H. R. 3067. An act for the relief of John Edgar White, a minor;

H. R. 3201. An act for the relief of Bertha M. Harris;

H. R. 5487. An act to amend section 4551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 46, sec. 643); and

H. J. Res. 221. Joint resolution to permit articles imported from foreign countries for the purpose of exhibition at the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition, Dallas, Tex., to be admitted without payment of tariff, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 595. An act for the relief of Mada Landtiser;

H. R. 3451. An act for the relief of F. M. Loeffler;

H. R. 3812. An act for the relief of the estate of Rees Morgan; and

H. R. 4951. An act to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 U. S. Stat. L. 2008–2009).

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 74. An act for the relief of Melba Kuehl;

S. 191. An act for the relief of Orson Thomas;

S. 274. An act for the relief of Joseph N. Wenger, lieutenant, United States Navy, and for other purposes;

S. 544. An act for the relief of M. K. Fisher;

S. 595. An act to amend the Communications Act of 1934, approved June 19, 1934, for the purpose of promoting safety of life and property at sea through the use of wire and radio communications, to make more effective the International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea, 1929, and for other purposes;

S. 750. An act to grant relief to persons erroneously convicted in courts of the United States;

S. 1470. An act authorizing and empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old post-office building at Oakland, Calif., and to convey to the city of Oakland portions of the site for street-widening purposes in accordance with the provisions of public act approved August 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 800);

S. 1550. An act to provide for the appointment of two additional circuit judges for the ninth judicial circuit;

S. 1570. An act granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, and North Dakota with respect to the Red River of the North; and

S. 1684. An act for the relief of the State of Pennsylvania.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) entitled "Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war', approved August 31, 1935, as amended", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. BORAH to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be permitted to sit today during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert an address delivered by Hon. James M. Landis, Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, before the Harvard Alumni Club, of Boston, March 17, 1937.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is James M. Landis still functioning as a Government official or is he now dean of the Harvard Law School?

Mr. MAVERICK. He is still head of the Securities and Exchange Commission. This is a high Government official speaking on a subject that concerns strikes.

Mr. RICH. Is he working for the Government now or is he connected with the Harvard Law School?

Mr. MAVERICK. He is working for the Government of the United States; he is doing a good job, too; he will soon be the dean of Harvard Law School.

Mr. RICH. Is he located in Washington?

Mr. MAVERICK. He is located in Washington, D. C., United States of America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture considering the sugar bill be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House today and tomorrow.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I presume this is in accordance with the desires of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

SIT-DOWN STRIKES

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for half a minute, and that I may be permitted to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the motto, "He who hesitates is lost", has application only when a question of principle is involved. It has no application when politicians are considering political expediency. Then the course is hesitation, indecision, vacillation, statements framed, if possible, to please everyone; thus loss of votes may be avoided.

No one desires violence, bloodshed, the shooting of strikers, nonstrikers, or innocent bystanders. Concededly, the sit-down strike in Michigan, which has degenerated into successful armed rebellion against authority of State and Nation, has neither legal, moral, nor economic justification.

From some stores, business places, comparatively small factories in Detroit, sit-down strikers have been thrown out by the police. But not many blocks away, sit-down strikers in automobile plants are guaranteed protection by the attitude of the Governor, who at Flint prevented police from interfering with or enforcing the law against sit-down strikers.

The strikers in the stores and small factories have no political influence.

Other unsuccessful sit-down strikers who were without political influence are Walter Doyle and his mother, Gertrude Doyle, who were ousted from their home in Ocean City, N. J., by Sheriff Paul M. Scull and four deputies, who moved their household goods out on the sidewalk, under an order obtained by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation of the Federal Government.

One class of sit-down strikers is made to feel the hand of the law. Another group enjoys immunity. Why? The answer is clear to one familiar with recent political events. It is, "Have you political influence?"

"Sit-downers" in the motor industry are supported by C. I. O., which has at its command millions of dollars and more millions of votes. They have political influence. This political influence, this vast sum of money which can be used for political purposes—the contribution last year was a half million—may explain—to my mind, it does explain—the break-down of the law in Michigan, where Governor Murphy is quoted in the New York papers of March 20 as saying that, in Detroit—

> There is a general picture of high wages, good condition, security, and recognition which is one of the best in the country. Wages here are the highest of any place in the country or the world.

He is also quoted as saying there would be no "compulsion."

The Governor further said:

> All parties, in my opinion, are desirous of complying with the orders of the court, as the authorities of Michigan will expect everyone to do.

But it is not forgotten that when the sheriff of Genesee County wanted to enforce the order of the court to oust the sit-down strikers, Governor Murphy prevented him from doing so.

Why did not the Governor himself enforce the law and the court orders, as he now states it is the duty of all to do?

The Governor's failure in the first instance to enforce the laws and court orders, when but few were involved in this rebellion, is the chief contributing cause to the present defiance of Michigan's laws and court orders.

An unequivocal demand from the Governor of Michigan and the President of the United States for obedience to the law would end sit-down strikes and lead to arbitration and final, permanent settlement of the issues involved.

Hundreds of thousands of law-abiding citizens, workers who want their jobs and the opportunity to work, and hundreds of thousands of property owners call upon the Governor of Michigan and the President of the United States to make good the oath of office they took when they assumed office and to protect them in their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. There is no need, there is no excuse for the President to remain silent until we have drifted into a state of civil war and then to assume the functions of a dictator. Let him act now—under the Constitution and the law which he took oath to maintain and enforce.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a brief joint statement by Hon. Manuel L. Quezon, President of the Commonwealth of the Philippines, and Hon. Francis B. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State, and also a resolution from the Philippine veterans in the Philippines.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] at Kalamazoo, Mich., on the evening of Friday, March 19, 1937.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE OF CONDOLENCE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the French Chamber of Deputies:

MARCH 20, 1937.

Cable via French, Paris.

President of the Chamber of Deputies to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, Washington, D. C.:

I express to you in behalf of the French Chamber of Deputies our deep sympathy for the catastrophe which has stricken the American Nation with a loss the more moving and affecting as it has killed so many of its young children, and beg to convey to their families our deepest sympathy.

EDOUARD HERRIOT, President.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Speaker will address an appropriate reply to the President of the Chamber of Deputies of France.

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, THE JUDICIARY, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1938

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5779) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes; and, pending that, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], the minority member of the committee, as to the time for general debate today, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] and myself.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, my suggestion is that we run along and see how we come out so far as today is concerned. I have a considerable number of requests for time on this side.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, it is contemplated, however, that general debate will close with today, at least?

Mr. BACON. May I say to the gentleman from Texas that is satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5779) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, with Mr. BUCK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the many municipal or city-owned electric plants which are already furnishing electricity at wholesale to farm membership electric companies are not acting alone from benevolence or public spirit but because they are not only increasing their profits but are reducing the cost of electricity to the consumers of the towns and cities.

By contracting with the farm electric company to furnish electricity at wholesale to farmers, the municipal or city-owned plants are increasing their production—the volume or output of electricity—one-third, or doubled, or many times over, accordingly as the farm consumers require.

THE ECONOMIC LAW OF COSTS

It is a well-recognized and accepted principle under the law of economic cost that the cost of a service or the cost of any product is determined by the scale of operation or the volume or amount of production under which the service or product is provided.

Under this economic law, the larger the scale of operations the lower will be the cost of the service, or the larger the volume of production the lower will be the cost of the product, and under which operations the small-scale operations make low cost impossible.

For this reason, it is greatly to the interest of the electrical consumers of every town or city operating an electrical generating plant, to take over the production of electricity to supply the surrounding farm territory for the purpose of increasing its output and reducing the unit cost to its own consumers.

WILL REDUCE RATES TO BOTH CITY AND FARM CONSUMERS

Such joint or cooperative operations by and between municipal or city-owned plants and farm electrical companies will not only reduce the rates of electricity to the lowest possible minimum, but the economy of larger scale production will bring down the costs for electricity, the same to the farm and the towns or city consumers.

The reason why farm and rural areas cannot be served separately and apart from the towns and cities of the territory at low and reasonable rates is the identical and same reason why the consumers of towns and smaller cities cannot be served separately and alone from the consumer at such low and reasonable rates.

Municipal or city-owned electrical plants generating electricity for double the consumers, their own and the farmers of the surrounding territory, will reduce the costs or price to both in proportion to the increase of electricity generated. This is the economic principle of mass production operated not only for the benefit of the few but for the consuming mass of the people.

HOW LOW COSTS INCREASE USE AND CONSUMPTION

While not equally true for city consumers, it is true of farm electric consumers that a low rate or charge to consumers makes the use of electricity practical for almost an unlimited number of farm operations and doubles farm consumption of electricity or multiplies consumption many times over.

"This increased farm consumption operates to the benefit of city consumers as well as to the farm population." Every unit of increase of the city plant to supply the increased demands of farmers (in the same ratio reduces or) lowers the cost of electricity to the city consumers.

FARMERS WILL USE ELECTRICITY FOR MANY OPERATIONS

With a lower rate and charge for current, farmers will extend the use of electric power to other and many more farm operations to their profit and increased advantage, multiplying manyfold their consumption of electricity in such farm and farm-home operations.

It is, therefore, greatly to the interest of town and city electricity consumers that their municipal- and city-owned plants take over the production of electricity for the farm electrical companies now being organized and provide electric power for both city and rural consumers.

In other words, it is as much or more to the interests and special advantage of the consumers of a city electricity plant that the plant furnish the electricity at wholesale for the farm companies than it is to the farmers and rural consumers.

WILL NOT LOWER COSTS UNDER PRIVATE-COMPANY OPERATIONS

But this increase in volume of production under the economic law of cost only operates to reduce electric rates under municipal or city ownership and where production and distribution is carried on for use and service of the patrons or consumers and not for dividends, profits, and gains.

Under private company ownership operations solely for dividends, profits, and gains the increased output or production and the lower unit cost resulting would be shown only in the higher dividends, profits, and gains to stockholders and not in lower rates to consumers.

PRIVATE ELECTRIC COMPANIES OWNED BY HOLDING COMPANIES

To understand properly the reasons why the same increase in volume and production which lowers the cost of electricity to consumers under municipal- or city-owned plants will not operate to lower the cost of electricity produced under private electric plants, it must be realized and understood that the stock or shares of the local private plants are all held, manipulated, and controlled by certain foreign electric companies commonly known as holding companies, and all increased earnings are claimed for profits and dividends to stockholders.

WHERE ALL SAVINGS AND OPERATIONS WILL BENEFIT CONSUMERS

But municipal- or city-owned electrical plants are not required to take the savings realized from greater or increased production to pay millions for newspaper and other propaganda to maintain and justify their organization before the people of the country. And they have no stockholders to claim such savings in operations for increased dividends, profit, and gains.

LOW RATES WITH ELECTRICITY WITHOUT WATER POWER

Under more modern inventions and discoveries low and reasonable charges for electricity are no longer possible only at and near water-power sites. But electric power may now be developed at equally low or lower costs at any inland point in the country.

DIESEL AND HIGH-PRESSURE STEAM ENGINES

And now the marvel of the power developed by the Diesel engine is to be far outrivaled by the invention of a new design of high-pressure steam engines multiplying power manyfold from a fraction or far less fuel consumed.

The invention of the Diesel engine and other forms of power now developed has made the production of electricity possible at lower and more reasonable cost at any town or inland county seat and available to electrical consumers of towns, cities, and farm territories alike.

WHY RATES ARE NOT LOWERED UNDER PRIVATE COMPANIES

There is a reason why under private electric companies, even with these new improved facilities multiplying and increasing manyfold, the production and amount of electricity and lowering the unit cost of current the cost of electricity to consumers will not be brought down to the cost to the people.

These new power-producing inventions increasing the production of electricity at lower cost will not bring a reduction to the consumers under private electric companies. This is because the private electric company, under foreign holding companies, are required to apply all savings in operations to dividends, profits, and gains.

But municipal- or city-owned electric plants are not required to take savings in operation to pay millions for newspaper propaganda necessary to maintain and justify themselves before the people of the country.

ECONOMY OF INCREASED PRODUCTION NOT THE ONLY ADVANTAGE TO CITY CONSUMERS

But the economy of increased production and the increased sales of electricity is not the only profit and advantage gained by municipal- or city-owned plants in joining with the farm electrical company, and furnishing farm consumers with electricity.

There are many other services required to be performed by the farm electrical company which the municipal- or city-owned plant can perform for the farm membership at great profit and advantage to the municipal- or city-owned plant as well as to the farm electrical company.

MANY SERVICES THE CITY PLANT CAN PERFORM FOR FARM COMPANIES TO ADVANTAGE

After the rural lines are built, the farm electric membership company will require many services to be performed in the operation of their distributing system for which they are not especially equipped and for which they cannot properly prepare to perform without great present expense and outlay of money.

The rural electric membership will require constantly from time to time the services of an electrical engineer. This the municipal-, town-, or city-owned plant has already provided, and on its pay rolls, and such services can be furnished to the rural membership company, both at low cost to the farmers and at a great saving to the city.

MAINTENANCE AND REPAIR SERVICE

The rural membership electrical company will require a maintenance and repair service to restore fallen poles, wires, and make repairs, the equipment for which is costly not only to provide but to hold ready for service.

The town or city electric plants have such equipment already available and can furnish such services promptly to the rural electric membership at lower cost than can be provided by the farm company itself and at the same time effect great savings to the city.

Such repair and maintenance department of the town or city electrical plant is made or held subject to call from any part of the surrounding farm territory, and repairs are made promptly without delay, of great and valuable service to the farmers and at the same time reducing the operating expense of the city plant.

METERS, BILLS, AND ACCOUNTING

Then the rural meters must be read and the accounts billed out to the farm consumers and there must be an adequate accounting service maintained at all times, and reports made, for which the town- or city-owned plant is already fully equipped with facilities to make and keep prompt and accurate accounts.

The town or city plants can furnish such services to the rural electric membership company and perform the same efficiently and at lower costs than the farm membership could provide for, and at the same time effect a very substantial saving to the town and city electrical plant.

LEGAL AND OTHER SERVICES

And the same can be said of legal services and the many incidental services necessary and required by farm electric companies, and which can be performed by the town or city plant at comparatively low and trivial cost and at a great and substantial saving both to the city plant and to the farm cooperative company.

Such services performed for both city and farm company utilizing the same facilities and equipment always lying idle a greater part of the time will eliminate much loss and waste and work great economy in operations alike to city plants and farm company.

Under such a policy of providing electricity the charges can be brought down to the consumers at the lowest possible rate consistent with efficient and reliable services.

GREAT ADVANTAGES COMING TO MERCHANTS

But such a mutual arrangement for the performance of these incidental services will bring to the merchants of the town or city more than ordinary or usual business opportunity, the opportunity to negotiate with the farmers and solicit their orders and contracts for many electrical utensils and equipments.

Bills rendered for electricity used will constantly bring the farmers of the county to the town or city for adjustment and payment, there to meet and confer with the merchants for further electrical work and supplies, leading to a better and more familiar acquaintance, and the opportunity to show equipment and quote prices, and submit offers or contracts for the work.

WIRING HOUSES AND FURNISHING ELECTRICAL EQUIPMENT

After the farm distributive lines are built the Government will make another loan to the farm electrical consumers for the purpose of wiring farm buildings and providing necessary farm equipment to enable all farmers to begin the full use of electricity at one time.

LOANS MADE TO MERCHANTS SUPPLYING FARMERS

This all will average not less than $150 for each and every farm consumer and will total in all from $100,000 to $300,000 to a county. These loans will be made to farmers direct with which to pay for wiring and equipment or to the persons, business firms, or corporations furnishing equipment or providing the service.

If the contract for furnishing electric current is entered into with the private farm electrical company this latter company will be afforded an opportunity, and of which opportunity advantage will be taken to solicit the wiring of the farm houses, and furnishing the equipment required. And the local business interests of the town or city will be without opportunity to negotiate for the business.

CLOSER RELATIONSHIP OF BUSINESSMEN WITH FARMERS

By the local municipal- or city-owned plant contracting with the farm electrical company to furnish current and other electric service, the businessmen of the town or city will be afforded a closer relationship with the farmers, and with the opportunity to furnish and provide the farmers with electrical appliances for any purpose required as users and consumers of electricity.

SOME OF THE APPLIANCES REQUIRED FOR THE FARM HOME

The following are some of the many uses which electricity can be made to serve to relieve from the irksome drudgery of woman's work on the farm, and the many comforts, conveniences, and pleasures which electricity will bring to the farm home and the electrical equipment for which the merchants of the town or city will be called upon to supply:

For churning,
For corn poppers,
For doorbells,
For hair driers,
For hair clippers,
For bottle heaters,
For water heaters,
For curling irons,
For flatirons,
For lighting dwellings,
For radio sets,
For electric ranges,
For refrigerators,
For sewing machines,
For sausage grinders,
For toasters,
For vacuum cleaners,
For waffle irons,
For washing machines,
For water coolers,
For water pumps,
For dish washers,
For air-conditioning systems,
And for other uses.

SOME OF THE EQUIPMENT NEEDED ON THE FARM

And the following are some of the tasks performed by electric power on the farm to relieve the burdens of farm work and the electrical appliances for which the merchants would be afforded the opportunity to furnish and sell to the farmers:

For cooling milk,
For pasteurizing milk,
For bottling milk,
For operating brooders,
For charging batteries,
For making cheese,
For cleaning grain,
For clipping horses,
For cold storage,
For concrete mixers,
For shelling corn,
For separating cream,
For cutting ensilage and feed,
For running frost-preventing fans,
For grinding feed and grain,
For threshing,
For heating water tanks,
For hoisting hay,
For making ice,
For operating incubators,
For milking cows,
For mixing feed,
For repair-shop machinery,
For running grindstones,
For sawing wood,
For shearing sheep,
For pumping water,
For lighting barns,
For lighting stables,
And other uses.

THE DEMAND WILL BE CONTINUOUS AND INCREASING

Such general use of electricity stimulated in such more and liberal greater volume as will be used under such lower and reduced rates will continually call for more and more electrical equipment, both for wiring and installation of new appliances for the use of electricity on the farm.

The benefits from this part of the program will be generally distributed among the merchants and business interests in the sale of many electrical utensils and appliances which such increased use will call for.

THE KILOWATT-HOUR OF ELECTRICITY AND WHAT IT WILL DO ON THE FARM

The kilowatt-hour is a measure of electricity, is a certain amount of electric power, like the pound is a certain amount of rice or flour, or the bushel is a measure or certain amount of wheat, corn, rye, oats, or potatoes.

The following is a list of some of the uses and some of the labor-saving operations which electricity will bring to the farm home, and what one kilowatt-hour will do and the cost to perform the service, taking the average farm consumption as 100 kilowatt-hours under the Peru, Ind., municipal farm rate:

WHAT 1 KILOWATT-HOUR WILL DO IN THE FARM HOME

One kilowatt-hour, at a cost of 4 cents,
Will light a 40-watt lamp for 25 hours, or Run a flatiron for 2 hours, or Pump 1,000 gallons of water from a shallow well, or Wash 70 pounds of clothes, or Refrigerate food for 18 hours, or Run a radio for 15 hours, or Run a vacuum cleaner for 3 hours, or Cook a meal on an electric range, or Run a sewing machine for 8 hours, or Tell time for 20 days, or Operate a mangle for 30 minutes, or Take care of door bells for a month and one-half, or Toast bread for 8 mornings, or Percolate 40 cups of coffee, or Operate kitchen mixer for 20 hours, or Heat 3 gallons water from 65 to 212 degrees, or Run a 6-inch fan for 50 hours, or Run pump for 3 hours, or Heat pad for 15 hours, or Heat curling iron for 42 hours, or Operate radiant heater for 2 hours, or Make 10 batches of ice cream, or Run exhaust fan for 5 hours, or Operate sun lamp for 1⅔ hours, or Make 30 waffles, or Operate moving-picture machine 4 hours, or Operate razor-blade sharpener 40 hours, or Stoke ¼ ton of coal, or Heat a hot plate for 2 hours.

There are many other uses in the home, such as pants pressers, tie pressers, floor polishers, sick-room vaporizers, egg boilers, water coolers, hair dryers, toys, trains, Christmas-tree lights, jigsaws, bottle warmers, massage machines, drink mixers, corn poppers, dumb-waiters, clothes driers, elevators, and electric razors.

The following is a list of some of the uses and operations which electricity will perform on the farm at great saving of time and labor, relieving farmers of many burdensome drudgeries and adding to their earnings and income and the cost to perform the work:

WHAT 1 KILOWATT-HOUR WILL DO ON THE DAIRY FARM

One kilowatt-hour, at a cost of 4 cents,
Will milk 30 cows, or Cool 10 gallons of milk, or Separate 2,000 pounds of cream and milk, or Wash 2,000 milk bottles, or Bottle 500 gallons of milk at 24 quarts per minute, or Operate milk irradiator for 6 hours, or Put a ton of ensilage in a 30-foot silo, or Elevate 1,500 pounds of shavings.

Other uses include utensil sterilizers, feed grinders, fly screens, milk testers, food-handling and water-control machinery, bottle cappers, and precooling.

WHAT 1 KILOWATT-HOUR WILL DO ON THE POULTRY FARM

One kilowatt-hour, at a cost of 4 cents,
Will hatch four chickens in an incubator, or

Brood one chick through entire season, or Test eggs for 40 hours, or Light a 100-bird poultry house for 4 days, or Cut 300 pounds of green feed, or Grind 90 pounds of bone or shells, or Shred 500 pounds of roots, or Operate a 200-watt floodlight for 5 hours, or Cut 1,000 pounds of straw in 2-inch lengths.

Electricity is also used for sprouting oats, warming drinking water by an immersion heater.

WHAT 1 KILOWATT-HOUR WILL DO ON THE GRAIN AND LIVESTOCK FARM

One kilowatt-hour at a cost of 4 cents
Will shell 30 bushels of corn, or Grind 400 pounds of shelled corn, or Grind 100 pounds of ear corn, or Grind 100 pounds of oats, or Grind 200 pounds of rye, or Grind 200 pounds of wheat, or Husk and shred 3 bushels of corn, or Grind 90 pounds of hay, or Thresh 4 bushels of oats, or Clean and grade 100 bushels of small grain, or Clean and grade 30 bushels of small seed, or Bale 4 bales of hay, or Shear 40 sheep, or Hoist 4 tons of hay, or
Clip and groom animals for 5 hours, or Operate hay dryer 15 minutes (with fuel oil), or Grind 250 pounds of meat, or Operate seed tester for 12½ hours.

Other uses include pig brooders, feed mixers, branding irons, and animal exercisers.

WHAT 1 KILOWATT-HOUR WILL DO ON ANY FARM AT CONVENIENCE

One killowatt-hour at a cost of 4 cents
Will grind 50 axes, or Gum ten 5-foot cross-saws, or Run a paint spray machine 4 hours, or Grade 600 bushels of potatoes, or Mix 2 cubic yards of concrete, or Saw a cord of wood, or Operate 2 square yards of hot bed 24 hours where the outside temperature is 40°, or Operate one-fourth horsepower utility motor 5½ hours, or Operate air compressor 2 hours, or Charge batteries 7 hours, or Operate forge blower 5 hours, or Operate engine warmer 5 hours, or Operate drill 3½ hours, or Operate grindstone 3.8 hours, or
Cook 62 pounds of bulbs, or Operate hedge trimmer 5 hours, or Operate lathe 1.8 hours.

Other uses include glue pots, soldering irons, cultivators, hive warmers, and potato kilns.

These are not complete lists but give a fair representation of the relationship between the kilowatt-hour of electricity and the work done. The figures will vary under different conditions.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] had to say the other day with respect to the report of the Brownlow reorganization committee as it related to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and other regulatory commissions or independent establishments of the Government. With him, may I say, that I am a friend of reorganization and hope to be able to support some of the intended legislation. I hope I may be able to support all of the legislation to be reported by the Joint Committee on Reorganization. I certainly cannot and shall not support it if the joint committee accepts some of the recommendations of the Brownlow committee which clearly would disorganize the present set-up wherein and whereby beneficent results have been accomplished.

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

In a limited way I know something about the reorganization of administrative management of State and municipal governments, from observation and from experience.

I am much interested in the general proposition. I have been reading the reports of reorganization commissions and committees and President's messages to Congress suggesting administrative changes.

It seems to me and it is my present impression and opinion that to make the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Power Commission, and other similar independent commissions into bureaus in some department or other of the Government would be a most serious mistake.

I wish all of you would read what Mr. MAPES says about these independent commissions—their origin; the reasons for their being; their functions and their responsibility to Congress, and Congress alone. It is important that you get the picture before you. Incidentally, you can, if you wish, renew your familiarity with what the Supreme Court has had to say with respect to some of these independent commissions and their responsibility to Congress as the delegative agents of Congress. But see what Mr. MAPES said on pages 1856 et sequentes of the RECORD. I quote briefly as indicative of the nature of his remarks—RECORD, page 1857:

IMPORTANCE OF COMMISSIONS

It would be hard to overstate the importance of these commissions. Every one of us, every American citizen, is directly affected by their work in his everyday life. In recognition of their importance and in order that they might be as free as possible from political and other control, Congress in creating them has given them an independent status outside of the regular departments of the Government, which are under the jurisdiction and the control of the members of the Cabinet. Up to this hour they are and always have been responsible to Congress, and to Congress alone. The Brownlow committee would change all this.

RECOMMENDATION OF BROWNLOW COMMITTEE

It is impossible to get the full import and implications of the Brownlow committee report without a careful study of it; but, stated briefly, as far as its proposal relating to these regulatory commissions is concerned, it recommends that they be deprived of their independent status, placed in one or another department of the Government, and put under the control of, and made responsible to, a member of the Cabinet, a political appointee, and, through him, to the President. After that has been done, the work of the commissions is to be divided; the legislative, or quasi-legislative, part of it is to be separated from the judicial, or quasi-judicial, part and performed by a bureau or division, set up in the department for that purpose, the members of the commissions proper to confine themselves in the future to the purely judicial part of the work now performed by them.

MEANS POLITICAL CONTROL

This recommendation, if carried out, means a radical change in a long-established practice of the Government and involves a question of public policy of fundamental importance. It seems to me, and to others with whom I have discussed the matter, that it would change the very nature of the Interstate Commerce Commission; in fact, that it would destroy it as we have known it and as it has existed throughout the years. A former member of the Commission, testifying before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House a few days ago, gave it as his opinion that it would be better to abolish the Commission altogether than to put into effect this recommendation of the Brownlow committee.

Putting these commissions under a member of the Cabinet means political control. Can anyone imagine anything more unfortunate? It means direct and constant contact between the Executive and the commissions, which would deprive them of the independence which they now enjoy. Their work would hereby be subjected to political influence which might prove very powerful when an administration had some political policy or plan it desired to put across or when the exigencies of party politics seemed to demand it. Think of the power which an Executive would have under such circumstances to reward or punish if he saw fit to use it for that purpose.

BETTER ABOLISH COMMISSIONS ALTOGETHER

Who would want to make a political campaign upon the issue of whether railroad rates should be lowered or raised? When one contemplates the possibilities of this proposal, he can well understand the feeling of the former member of the Interstate Commerce Commission who declared it would be better to abolish the Commission altogether.

The friends of the work of these commissions may take some encouragement from the apparent uncertainty of the Brownlow committee itself as to the wisdom of the recommendation.

The report speaks of it as a "possible solution" only. Referring to it, the report says:

"The following proposal is put forward as a possible solution of the independent-commission problem, present and future."

That language indicates that the committee itself was not certain of the wisdom of its position. It may be that upon further reflection it will withdraw the recommendation which it has made as to these commissions. It is devoutly to be hoped that it will; but if it does not, then the friends of the work which they are delegated to perform must rely upon the good judgment of the reorganization committees of the House and Senate not to report any legislation which will attempt to put the recommendation into effect.

MORE BUREAUS OR CORPORATIONS

As between bureaus and the formation of corporations one stands between the devil and the deep sea. The answer is found in not permitting these independent commissions to be disturbed in their present state, if you ask me.

INDEPENDENT COMMISSIONS SHOULD BE INDEPENDENT

I may not be able to look at this matter as I should for I am unalterably opposed to any further increase in useless bureaus or trend toward bureaucracy. Above all things else which should be avoided, these independent commissions should not be subjected to domination by, or to the partisan political whim of, any group of men, or any one man, who temporarily may be snapping the whip.

GOVERNMENTAL MACHINERY INEFFICIENT

Governmental administration machinery, overloaded as it has been, has slowed down. It is inefficient in operation, due to enlargement of functions, increase of load, and changes in patterns.

No one should entertain the mistaken notion that this situation can or will be rectified in a minute, or that wholesale abandonment of existing set-up, the substitution of new parts for old in the machinery, a general overhaul, a remodeling of the plant, the installation of new machinery, the employment of inexperienced help can or does mean anything more or other than an increase in expense.

Such reorganizations as are contemplated do not make for economy. Savings never immediately accompany such changes, if ever. It is to be hoped that something along the line suggested might be accomplished and some saving eventually effectuated. Experience, however, offers no substantial basis for entertaining any such hope, and we might as well understand it.

OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

For the present I shall confine myself, and desire to direct your attention, to the consideration of the report, insofar as it relates to the Office of the Comptroller General.

You all have a copy of the report of the President's committee. I commend to your careful consideration the recommendations of that committee, which are found on page 20, paragraph B, of the report under the heading "B. Direction and Control of Accounting and Expenditures."

I must be brief. I assure you I did not tend to take so much time. So, with the recommendation that you read carefully this portion of the report, I am going to pass to other matters.

PUBLIC, NO. 13 (67TH CONG.)

As a matter of legislative history, Congress enacted Public, No. 13, in the Sixty-seventh Congress, which was "An act to provide a National Budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes."

By, and by virtue of, title 3 of that act there was created an establishment of the Government to be known as the General Accounting Office, to be independent of the executive departments, and under the control and direction of the Comptroller General of the United States. You should read this, and more than once.

HOUSE DOCUMENT NO. 493 (72D CONG., 2D SESS.)

You should read House Document No. 493 (72d Cong., 2d sess.), which is a message from the President of the United States transmitting his recommendation "to guard, coordinate, and consolidate executive and administrative agencies of the Government as nearly as may be according to major purposes."

OTHER REPORTS HEREIN MENTIONED

You should read the report of the Joint Committee on Reorganization of the Administrative Branches of the Government, made by Mr. MAPES, of Michigan, for the Joint Committee on Reorganization, created under the joint resolution adopted December 17, 1920, which is House Document No. 356, of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

In this connection I commend to your careful consideration Report No. 524, of the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, found in Senate Reports, volume I, as Calendar No. 476, reported by Mr. McCormick from the Special Committee on the National Budget; the report of Mr. Good from the Select Committee on the Budget, known as Report No. 362, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, found in volume II, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, of House Reports, identified as Union Calendar No. 114.

You should also examine the report from the Committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill to provide a National Budget System and Independent Audit of Government Accounts, found in Report No. 1044, of the Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.

CHECK ON USELESS AND ILLEGAL EXPENDITURES

And lastly, so far as I am concerned, I suggest that you study carefully Report No. 14, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, from the Select Committee on the Budget, made by Mr. Good, and I particularly call your attention to the statement therein made to the effect that:

> The only way by which Congress can hold a check on expenditures is to continue a control and audit of the accounts by an independent establishment. * * * The creation of this office will enable it to furnish information to Congress and to its committees regarding the expenditures of the Government. * * * The creation of this office will, it is seen, serve as a check not only on useless expenditures but will keep the Bureau more keenly alive to a rigid performance of its duties.
> In conclusion it is desired again to point out that the provisions of the bill as framed by it carry no departure from the fundamental political principles of the present Government of the United States. It rather seeks to emphasize and make more effective those principles. It thus makes more definite the constitutional obligation that rests upon the President "from time to time to give to Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient" and furnishes him with the means by which he may meet this obligation. It provides for no restriction on the part of Congress to modify the proposals of the President, but, on the other hand, seeks to have such proposals come before it in such a form, so itemized, classified, and supported by detailed data, as will enable it more effectively to perform this function.

LAW OBSERVANCE IN USE OF APPROPRIATED MONEYS

Now, Mr. Chairman, this law which we are considering was deliberately enacted and the General Accounting Office was set up for the single purpose and with the single intent to do one thing, namely, to require law observance in the uses of appropriated moneys—to aid the Congress in this regard in discharging a constitutional responsibility to the people. It has accomplished that purpose, and in so doing has carried out the intent of Congress.

As someone has well said, the authority of the congressional branch to require law observance in the uses of appropriated moneys and in executive expenditures goes back to the days of William of Orange. William had been called from Holland to rule England when the English found it impossible to rule themselves. After he was safely in England a political sand boil spurted up behind the Dutch dikes. William asked the English Parliament for more money. Parliament suspected he wanted the money to cover the costs of his armies in Holland.

"What for?" asked Parliament.

"None of your business", said William. (This may not be an absolutely verbatim report.) "I'm the King, what? Send me the money and I'll spend it the way I want to. I can do a far better job of spending than you can."

"Go, my fair liege", replied Parliament in effect, "and jump in the lake."

The principle that the money-producing body shall say how the money shall be spent has been upheld in English and American jurisprudence ever since.

CRITICISMS BECAUSE ACT WORKED AS INTENDED TO WORK

Mr. Chairman, at the bottom of all the criticisms of the act which established the Office of Comptroller General, and the real, uncamouflaged reason underlying all other, given by those who would offer a new scheme or system, is the fact that the act worked as it was intended it should work, and exactly as Congress proposed to have it work. It accomplished those very things which it undertook to effectuate, therefore it should not be changed or amended for the purpose of emasculation or repeal.

STRENGTHENED, NOT WEAKENED

That it has functioned as it was intended it should is the compelling reason for strengthening rather than weakening the provisions of the act, for its continuance, and for the position I have above taken. It should remain unmolested by those who would interfere with it, undisturbed by those who claim they have suffered interference by reason of it, and unassailed by others who have undoubtedly been inconvenienced.

Were the matter to be gone into on Congress' own volition and motion out of the experience of the years, there would of necessity come the conviction that the independent audit system should be strengthened, not weakened, emasculated, or crucified, as proposed by the President's committee.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL THE AGENT OF CONGRESS

Significant facts which should not be overlooked by Members of Congress are found in the language of the act creating a General Accounting Office, an office—

Which shall be independent of the executive departments and under control and direction of the Comptroller General of the United States.

In this act it is provided that:

Among other things, as the agent of Congress—

The Comptroller General or the Assistant Comptroller General may be removed at any time by joint resolution of Congress after notice and hearing when, in the judgment of Congress, the Comptroller General or Assistant Comptroller General has become permanently incapacitated or has been inefficient, or guilty of neglect of duty, or of malfeasance in office, or of any felony or conduct involving moral turpitude, and for no other cause and in no other manner except by impeachment * * *.

(b) He shall make such investigations and reports as shall be ordered by either House of Congress or by any committee of either House having jurisdiction over revenue, appropriations, or expenditures. The Comptroller General shall also, at the request of any such committee, direct assistants from his office to furnish the committee such aid and information as it may request.

(c) The Comptroller General shall specially report to Congress every expenditure or contract made by any department or establishment in any year in violation of law.

(d) He shall submit to Congress reports upon the adequacy and effectiveness of the administrative examination of accounts and claims in the respective departments and establishments and upon the adequacy and effectiveness of departmental inspection of the offices and accounts of fiscal officers.

Why should Congress be asked to surrender not only the right but its duty to require law observance? It should not.

Congress should insist that the Office of Comptroller General should be continued substantially pursuant to the terms and according to the provisions of the act by which it was created, strengthened, and circumscribed only with and by the limitations therein contained be empowered to function effectively and independently as prescribed and made possible by the act.

CONGRESS SHOULD DEFEND ITSELF AND PRESERVE ITS PREROGATIVES

Congress should protect itself. It should resent and show its unmistakable disapproval of every suggestion looking toward the surrender by it of any of its rights and prerogatives, and most emphatically should it decline to surrender its authority and duty to require law observance. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire today to call attention to the membership of this House the necessity for curtailing appropriations by the Congress of the United States. Continuing appropriations as we have been doing is not for the best interest of the Government.

To refresh your recollection, I will state in round sums the appropriations for the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress and also what is likely to be appropriated for the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress.

Total appropriations, 74th Cong., 2d sess. (including interest on public debt, sinking fund, and other permanent appropriations), being for the fiscal year 1937 and also embracing supplemental and deficiency appropriations for the fiscal year 1936	$10,336,000,000
Less appropriations for Adjusted Compensation Payment Act (bonus)	2,237,000,000
All other	8,099,000,000
Total estimates of appropriations in the Budget as submitted to the 75th Cong., 1st sess. (including interest on the public debt, sinking fund, and other permanent appropriations), being for the fiscal year 1938 but not including relief or emergency conservation work (C. C. C.)	6,520,000,000
Relief and recovery (the Budget message expressed the hope it would not exceed this amount for 1938)[1]	1,537,000,000
Emergency conservation work (C. C. C.). (The law for the C. C. C. expires on June 30 next and continuance is dependent upon legislation at this session for a permanent policy. To date no bill has been taken up.) The appropriations for the present fiscal year total	403,000,000
Appropriations in first deficiency act at this session, consisting principally of relief, C. C. C., and crop loans	950,000,000
	9,410,000,000

[1] Appropriations for relief for the fiscal year 1937 consist of primary appropriation of $1,425,000,000 and supplemental appropriation of $789,000,000—a total of $2,214,000,000. To hold relief to $1,537,000,000 for 1938 means a decrease under 1937 funds of $677,000,000, into which enters the factors of employment in private industry, improvements in business conditions, etc.

You can readily see that in all probability the expenditures for this coming fiscal year will be $9,410,000,000; but this does not include any increase in appropriations for that which has already been authorized under the law. As an illustration, under the Flood Control Act $30,000,000 are the Budget figures for this coming fiscal year. If any increase is desired, that will mean just that much more.

No one knows yet or no one can give an estimate of what the farm-tenancy and crop-insurance plans will cost. An estimate is $175,000,000.

In the short statement that I am making I am not at the present time speaking about revenues that we collect, but I am trying to impress upon you the necessity for a curtailment of expenditures.

I might have added in speaking to you just now of the other expenditures that confront us that a great many are asking that the relief appropriations be increased up to two and one-quarter billion dollars, over seven hundred million more than the Budget calls for.

Mr. Chairman, the time has come when we, as Members of Congress, must seriously consider the necessity of curtailing expenditures, of committees' making authorizations for expenditures, and of the Appropriations Committee's reporting out appropriation bills. And the time is here when it is necessary for us to have a sit-down strike on making appropriations for and spending unnecessary money. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I greatly appreciate the words of the gentleman who just took his seat. It is rather courageous for a gentleman on that side of the aisle to make a speech of that kind. They are usually reserved for Members of the minority party, but the alarm bells are now ringing on the New Deal. We note a good deal of impatience on the part of many of the majority party.

She was suing for divorce. The judge asked her, "Can you allege cruelty; has he struck you yet?" "No; but he goes about slamming his fist against the doors and saying under his breath, 'I wish it was you.'" [Laughter.]

Probably, and soon, many of you are going to slam your remarks against something that is not a door, and the results may be persuasive. The New Deal has a real case of acute indigestion at the moment. The doctors in attendance, Eccles, Morgenthau, and Wallace, very suddenly seem to have demanded a complete reversal of the treatment they themselves have been administering to the patient in large doses. Now will these other doctors, Ickes, Hopkins, and Perkins, cooperate? The gentleman from North Carolina, in his earnest appeal, indicated that he hoped so.

Certainly Dr. Eccles shocked the Nation with a statement of the patient's true condition, and although he is greatly to be commended now, and his logic is completely convincing, it would have been more satisfactory to many of us had he also been willing to acknowledge that he himself, to a large extent, had been responsible for the recent huge Government spending by his assertions that he did not fear a Federal debt of $40,000,000,000, and that the Budget need not necessarily be balanced oftener than once in 10 years.

I have quoted this statement of his before. It is here in this volume for your delectation, if you wish to read it. Now he seems to have maneuvered himself into a very tight place and states that he is being misrepresented.

As I understand it, Mr. Eccles was a very prominent and successful banker in the State of Utah, who not only saved his own banks but his own fortune before coming to Washington.

I think he was an Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, and was afterward made Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. I certainly do not wish to misrepresent him, but, of course, I think he was the man most responsible for that complete somersault that your President turned in 1933. When he was seeking election he promised to balance the Budget; to cut the expenses of the Federal Government 25 percent; that he would not fill up the banks further with evidences of debt, as, he declared, the former administration had done. But somehow it seems that after he met Governor Eccles the Keynes-Eccles theory of borrowing and spending appealed to him as the very thing to do to bring back prosperity. This theory they have followed in full measure. Governor Eccles presented his views to our Banking and Currency Committee for many days in 1935. Here in this volume are the hearings. I was greatly disturbed, as I have said here often, and as I have a ranking minority place on the Committee on Expenditures, I suppose it is my job to be critical of these huge expenditures. I spoke recently on "a $7,000,000,000 Government, permanently established." The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], who preceded me, says that we are to spend something like $9,000,000,000 this year.

I was greatly interested in Mr. Eccles' many statements. He showed to us how "debt created money", and that if you and I were unwilling to give the banks our notes and create deposits, the Government must do so. The Government has certainly followed his suggestion. He then insisted that we need have no fear of inflation, and often through those hearings—and I have many excerpts here from his testimony—he stated that inflation was most difficult to achieve; that inflation could be controlled much better than deflation. And only last month, in the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency, he asserted several times that he could see no immediate inflation. When the chairman of the committee remarked:

> I am unable to see in the situation that exists where we are in any danger of going too fast or reaching a basis of inflation—

Mr. Eccles replied:

> No; and at the moment I do not feel that we are doing it.

He has often told us how hard it would be to get inflation. Two years ago we gave him enormous powers. He claimed that if we gave him the power of open-market operations without permission of the President, and the power to freeze the reserves, that undoubtedly he could control such a situation. He said open-market operations is the primary object that we want, and that the freezing of reserves was a secondary operation. I ask you, which do you think is now the primary or the secondary operation? Has he tried the primary, or open market, operations and has it failed? Only recently he has availed himself of the full power granted him to freeze the reserves. I do not wish to misrepresent him, but here is his testimony. He even suggested that the open-market operations would take care of such situations and it would probably not be necessary to freeze the reserves. He stated that the power of raising of the interest rates, the open-market operations, and the freezing of the reserves would undoubtedly prevent another inflation. But now, within a week, we are apparently faced with immediate inflation and the cry is taken up by Secretary Morgenthau and Secretary Wallace and followed by appeals from Secretary Roper. Is this a trial balloon? Are these present calamity howlers meaning what they say, or is it a red herring drawn across the trail in order to get the President more power? Is it an argument to assist directly in backing up the President in his Supreme Court fight? Is it an alibi or is it real? If this is real—and we ought to accept it from such sources as real—what are we going to do about it? And what can we do about it? Such former testimony even of 1 month ago naturally leads us to have a little doubt about the real intent of such calamity statements at the moment. I trust that you who are interested will read other excerpts from Mr. Eccles' testimony of 2 years ago and even of 1 month ago. We sympathize with the statement of his present viewpoint, however, although we have taken issue with him heretofore. The administration has created these conditions and is now unable to check them. They have been forced to issue these solemn warnings. It must be assumed that such important statements would not have been given out without consultation with the President. It will be the death knell of many of these new projects mentioned by the previous speaker [Mr. BULWINKLE], such as farm tenancy, housing, and other similar projects.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Of course the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and has given deep study to the question of inflation, as we all have, and he knows and understands the power of the Federal Reserve Board to prevent such things as inflation and even deflation by the manipulation of the money market of the country. What value is there to increase reserve requirements of the member banks for the purpose of raising the interest rate and to prevent inflation, if it results in deflation in the price of Government bonds at the other end of the line, and forces the Reserve Board out into the market to stabilize the bonds of the Government itself by open-market operations on them? What remedy has the gentleman to suggest for that kind of a situation that apparently exists now?

Mr. GIFFORD. I shall put into my remarks several remedies, the first of which is to balance the Budget and stop spending, stop this constant issuance of credit money, although I fear it may be too late. This country cannot stand a debt of thirty-five or forty billion, plus a contingent debt of five billion. In his testimony the Governor told us at one time that the debt of Great Britain was $46,000,000,000, and at another time $35,000,000,000. Since the deflation of the pound we do not know what it is; but we do know that if Great Britain were willing to dispose of only a few of her interests in her colonial possessions she could wipe out her debt with one stroke.

His attempt to soothe us by a comparison with England's position in the matter of indebtedness is not persuasive. Conditions are vastly different.

But what is the real trouble of the moment? I think I know what it is. A week ago bonds went down in the market as they have not gone down for several years. How many times have you listened to me and others say that when business recovers even slightly, and even a slightly higher rate of interest is offered, then, of course, the bonds will be dumped on the market, first by the local banks and then by the larger ones. They will wish to take advantage of that little higher interest rate.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. KERR. Are not bonds worth today twice as much on the markets of this country as they were when the gentleman's party went out of office in 1933?

Mr. GIFFORD. No, indeed. In 1920, when business loans commanded higher rates of interest, we had to sacrifice our Government bonds for as low as 83 when we needed the money in our business, where we could get higher returns.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman said he did not know. I will tell him that it is a fact that bonds today are worth more than twice as much as they were when the gentleman's party went out of office in 1933.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, no; that is ridiculous. Of course, they are worth more, because when my party went out of power March 4, 1933, things were in pretty bad shape. My party was not greatly to blame for that. That takes a little time to answer, but it is a fact. History will teach you that. Certainly Government bonds were down, but not to the ridiculous amount stated. It can easily be ascertained.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a fact that the per-capita national debt in the United States is much smaller than it is in Great Britain or France?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; but you do not count the citizens of those colonial possessions of Great Britain, for whose benefit the debt was so largely contracted. If you want to pursue that line, our debt would be so much more. There is no comparison. Oh, how statistics can easily be made to lie!

Why did Government bonds decline on the market? Are not the chickens coming home to roost? How many times must we tell you that you were mistaken in your gloating over the fact that the credit of the Government was so good that you could borrow money for long terms for 2¼ percent? I have often said, "You will wish to God you had paid a higher rate, so that people would hold on to them." Governor Eccles says, "We must continue easy money. We must continue to have low interest rates, or if we do not our vast Government issues will be jeopardized." Just as if low interest rates would coax money to take the risks of business. No. You must have a reward for the money invested in a business. The Eccles theory is incorrect. He has proven his own theory incorrect; and now for the alibi. Now he is blaming John L. Lewis. But did not he hand Lewis a good one? He criticized labor demands and blames business for putting up prices as a result of them. That is all so funny. We have had two big doses of his medicine, and an alibi must now be found. He cannot continue easy money and have it assume the present great risks in business enterprises, with the Government constantly harassing business, not only through excessive taxation but actually in the conduct thereof; and now, above all else, lending comfort to the illegal strikes that are shaking the very foundations of our Government itself.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GIFFORD. Why should I yield when I need so much time to make reference to the opinions of shrewd commentators and many experts who write on financial subjects? You should be forced to listen to much of it. However, I do wish to arouse interest and discussion in the Chamber.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MAY. I think this is a matter of current vital importance to the House of Representatives, and I think it ought to be discussed on a nonpartisan basis rather than partisan.

Mr. GIFFORD. It is being discussed on a nonpartisan basis by me this afternoon.

Mr. MAY. As I see the situation, there is just one of two or three things that Congress can do to correct what might happen in the future. The gentleman has said balancing the Budget will solve the problem. How are you going to balance the Budget if we continue to spend money for relief and other purposes that it is necessary to spend it for, without the levying of further taxes, and how are we going to stand any further taxes now?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman is answering his own question by the tone of his voice in asking it. We cannot stand any new or additional taxes. We cannot continue paying out such large sums of money, even at the instance of the Governors of the different States. Shame on the Governors of those States coming to Washington and demanding further raids on the National Treasury. The credit of their States is still good, is it not?

They are careful, indeed, about their own credit. Our municipalities are exceedingly careful in their town meetings not to greatly disturb their own credit. Are they, then, not interested in preserving the national credit, which is so much more important? The National Government must preserve its credit in order to relieve such States as may really need assistance and whose credit is exhausted.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MAY. What would the gentleman do when 15 or 20 Governors come here and swear and declare that their governments are bankrupt and that the matter of relief raises an imminent problem; that they have got to deal with it but that they have not got any money?

Mr. GIFFORD. I would have them prove their case. I want our President to be courageous. I ask him not further to keep silence in this hour of anarchy through which we are passing. This is a time when silence speaks volumes. Where is that courage that he exhibited during the first half year of his administration? I hope this will not be regarded as partisan, because I would surely say it of a Republican President under similar circumstances.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Before I ask this further question, I want to say that I, as one Member of this House, always give the gentleman a respectful hearing, because I know he is a student of these affairs.

Mr. GIFFORD. And I speak frankly, do I not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; the gentleman does. We have so far discussed the taxes of the United States in relation to those of other countries. Is it not a fact that the taxes in the United States are less than they are in Great Britain and France?

Mr. GIFFORD. I could not go fully into that, even if I were able, because it would take too much of my time this afternoon. I covered that subject matter the other day. The central government of Great Britain pays about one-half municipal expenses, and the expenses of a municipality there are nothing like those of ours. The gentleman can figure out that our taxes seem less according to our ability to pay, but we must take into account different conditions, especially their colonial possessions. I have dealt with this subject before.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from West Virginia overlooks the fact that in Great Britain they have but one tax, whereas within the United States we have multiple taxes, which, added together, make a heavier burden than the British tax.

Mr. GIFFORD. I hope that speakers will not continue these manifestly unfair comparisons. The picture usually drawn is untrue; yet when we come to an income-tax bill how the Members love to say that the income-tax payer of Great Britain pays much more than the income-tax payer of the United States. That is true in some brackets, but the ordinary citizen in the United States pays more.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I hesitate to continue this line of questioning, but is it not a fact that the per-capita tax in those countries is greater than it is in the United States? I ask the question in that way, the per-capita tax. I feel certain that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] is incorrect in saying but one tax exists in the other nations.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield, income tax, yes; but when you add all the taxes the American taxpayer pays and compare them with what the Englishman pays, it will be found that the Americans pay much more than the Englishman.

Mr. GIFFORD. I trust I may be permitted to carry on the subject I started to discuss and to enlarge upon my intended subject matter, but let me give you an illustration of the last ridiculous tax bill. A neighbor of mine, a good citizen in the lumber and building-materials business, died recently. They found among his assets many second mortgages, many notes, many uncollected bills. He had been easy with his debtors. They found he owed a considerable sum, but not as much as his assets' indicated value. The creditors got together and cheerfully agreed to wait 5 years for full payment; that the estate could pay one-fifth of the indebtedness each year, so that the widow could continue the business. The company made good profits last year, but they could not pay the debts without a fine imposed by the Government. Had they done so they would have found that instead of paying the usual 12½- or 13½-percent tax they would have been fined up to 27 percent. So they paid the one-fifth, as agreed, and distributed the rest as bonuses to the workmen in the plant. Those workmen will probably say: "This Roosevelt policy is good; I guess we had better vote for Roosevelt." That is the result, yet it cripples business. Creditors may curse such tax bills all they please. What are we going to do about it? Apparently nothing. I made an address on this subject of taxation the other day. I hardly think I want to repeat it now.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman has spoken of some of the bills that have been passed. The question that has been going through my mind is why so many of the Democrats will follow the President blindly in everything that he proposes in the way of legislation without knowing what the results will be? Can the gentleman answer that?

Mr. GIFFORD. I think that question should be answered easily.

Mr. MAY. Loyalty.

Mr. GIFFORD. Loyalty! It reminds me of an address I made last year on the subject of Blind Loyalty; and I might add, too, because so many of you newer Democrats, at least, came in on the coattails of the President, they feel that they must remain near to him.

Someone, I recall, asked a child, "Why were you born in Pennsylvania?"

"Oh", came the reply, "in order to be near my mother."

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARNOLD. Is it not the custom of the Republican sons to stay close to their mothers?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, perhaps—if we can find our mother. I read this morning in an editorial:

> What are we to do? What is by far the most important single measure for the Government to take in order to balance the Budget? Then other measures would be comparatively easy. What other method can be effected and what is necessary, apart from the imposition of a tax, to take care of the balancing of the Budget? Let us stay the rapid expansion of these old bureaus and cease the creation of new ones. It is a reverse to the present tendency, but let us turn these emergency forms of expenditure into permanent forms.

Then turn back to the States and localities some of the responsibilities that were taken from them.

We ask today, Is this another emergency simply created to order? Those are not my words. Those are the words of many of our writers. Many suspect that there is now another emergency made to order.

I want to comment upon that briefly, and this is not political. The President of the United States came into this Chamber and told us substantially that the members of the Supreme Court were too old, that they could not have the right viewpoint, that all of the judiciary should be overhauled, that they were greatly behind in their work; much of which has been proved not to be the case. So he resorted to another argument at the "victory dinner", stating that the Dust Bowl is blowing now, that one-third of our people are ill fed and ill housed now, and similar platitudes. The audience applauded hilariously under the spell of that beautiful voice. But when we come to our senses how ridiculous it seems to us. It always has been, and in the future it will be, that perhaps one-third of the people will be relatively ill-fed and ill-housed, in spite of all their Government can do for them.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman is very busy with me this afternoon.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am happy to be busy with a man who is giving us something on which to ask questions.

Mr. GIFFORD. I hope to do so with a smile today. I know that sometimes I wear an unpleasant expression and I have been reminded of that, but may I paraphrase a verse that applies? "The gentleman is handsomer by far. But my face, I don't mind it, for I am behind it; it is you out in front that I jar."

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman said we applauded the President hilariously. The gentleman did not mean to include himself, did he?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; he would not have heard me. I was listening on the radio. I also heard the so-called Crown Prince speak over the radio the other evening and I thought he did a very wonderful job. I felt sure he had been sitting on his father's knee when I noticed his voice and its inflections and the familiar arguments.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KERR. My friend made a statement a while ago that the President of the United States appeared before this body and made a statement that was absolutely false.

Mr. GIFFORD. No; I did not mean to say that.

Mr. KERR. In respect to the congestion of the courts as exist in this country, may I say the Attorney General of the United States made a most lucid statement about the situation, and if the gentleman will read that statement I think he will agree that most of the dockets of the courts of this country are behind.

Mr. GIFFORD. It is constantly stated that the work of the Supreme Court is not behind. However, it was so stated to us by the President of the United States as I recall it. Do not mention the Attorney General to me until you convert your own Senator GLASS, who says we need a new Attorney General more than a new Court.

Mr. Chairman, I have probably used most of my time, and as I have the permission to enlarge upon my remarks I will stop at this point, unless other Members wish to interrogate me.

I have read that the President is insisting that corrective measures are necessary now and that he has declared it as his ambition during the next 3 years "to abolish poor pay to workers, to remove slums, to save farmers from drought and overproduction, to shorten working hours and give workers time for recreation, to end child labor, to stop strikes, and to keep farm prices up." And all he needs in order to do these things, he explained, is an acquiescent Supreme Court. But neither Mr. Roosevelt nor any other Executive could accomplish what he speaks of in 4 years or in 4 centuries. The impossibility of his objectives cannot justify the stultification of the Supreme Court. It must be brought home to our people that in a democracy such as ours we cannot fully control labor and prices. Hitler can do it. Mussolini can do it. Stalin can do it. Blum cannot do it. The sacrifice of liberty for such power must not be granted. This does not mean that palliative measures should not be adopted in conformity with our form of government. Neither boastful nor demagogic statements must affect the foundations of our national structure.

However, the only thing we have to fear is fear.

And in these times we should be very tenacious of at least the appearance of adequacy. I repeat:

Are these warnings only trial balloons? Is it another emergency made to order? Is it a tool to be used in forcing public opinion to the side of the President in the Court fight? A search for the gentleman in the wood pile is on. Has the Keynes-Eccles theory really exploded with such violence? Shall not huge Government spendings go merrily on? Can we combat the demands of the beneficiaries, not only from individuals but from Governors and mayors, who have been so anxious concerning their own municipal debts, but entirely careless of the debt of the Nation? Now, a great fear of the dreadful calamity of inflation is advanced by the administration itself. The Supreme Court upheaval has brought a great fear upon the Nation. The most illegal and dangerous form of strikes ever known is rampant and the silence of the administration has spread a great fear on all law-abiding citizens. Yes, "All we have to fear is fear."

Let us hope that Governor Eccles now means what he says and will pursue his recently declared policy; let us hope that the President is behind him and that they are determined to return us to national solvency.

Such a tremendous volume of Government securities issued at such low yields of interest to the holders is, and will continue to be, a constant menace to this solvency.

Question marks for 1938 may well receive most careful attention by this Congress.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a bill which I have introduced today.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A bill to provide $30,000,000,000, which shall be expended within a period of 5 years, to furnish employment and to end poverty in the United States and its possessions

Whereas there are many millions of persons unemployed in the United States, and many of those who are unemployed are young men and women; and, because of this unemployment situation, men and women have been compelled to go into bread lines and do many other things which are humiliating to them; and

Whereas there is an abundance of the necessities of life, and yet many of our citizens are compelled to go hungry; and

Whereas this human misery has been brought about because our people have been unable to find employment; and

Whereas if we became engaged in war we would spend billions of dollars in the destruction of property and humanity; and

Whereas if we spend billions of dollars for construction purposes we would be promoting the welfare of mankind: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That $30,000,000,000 shall be expended by the Federal Government within a period of 5 years to provide employment and to end poverty in the United States.

SEC. 2. The money shall be expended for the prevention of floods, forest fires, dust storms; soil erosion; purification of rivers and streams; slum clearance; construction of homes that can be sold or rented at reasonable cost, schools, hospitals, roads, bridges, reservoirs, canals, tunnels, subways, and disposal plants; elimination of dangerous grade crossings; rural electrification; the purchase of railroads and other utilities, which shall be owned by the Government; development of our natural resources; and for medical, surgical, dental, biological, geological, and every other art and science; and for every other purpose which will solve the unemployment problem and promote the welfare of the people of our country.

SEC. 3. No person employed by the Federal Government under the provisions of this act shall be compelled to work more than 5 days per week nor more than 6 hours in any one day, and the wage paid shall be no less than 75 cents per hour.

SEC. 4. Union organizations must be recognized under this act.

SEC. 5. The President of the United States shall be authorized to appoint a committee of at least five members, or as many as he believes is necessary, to devise ways and means to secure the money to carry out the provisions of this act. It shall be the duty of the committee to obtain the said money from such sources which will work the least hardship on the taxpayers of our country.

SEC. 6. This act shall become effective within 90 days after its passage.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

It is not my desire to take up the time of the House with a recitation of all of the activities and problems that the committee has had to deal with in the course of its deliberations in preparing this bill for the consideration of the House.

For 2 months the subcommittee, of which I have the honor and the pleasure of serving as chairman, has been engaged in hearing the testimony in justification of the needs of the four departments for funds to carry on their activities.

With the fine cooperation that has been extended to me by my colleagues we have completed the bill, and I now present it to you for your consideration with the unanimous approval of the entire committee on every item contained therein.

I believe Members of the House who have never served on the Appropriations Committee have little idea of the intricate detail that must be considered in the preparation of appropriation bills for the various departments from year to year. With the able assistance of the older majority members of the committee, Judge TARVER, of Georgia, Mr. MCANDREWS, of Illinois, and Mr. RABAUT, of Michigan, and with the fine cooperation of my genial and distinguished friend from New York, Mr. BACON, the ranking minority member, we have arrived at our conclusions on the different items after a period of about 9 weeks of continuous hearings and study. I also want to say a word of commendation of the two new members of the subcommittee, Mr. CALDWELL, of Florida, and Mr. CARTER, of California. Their devotion to our task is greatly appreciated, and their counsel and wisdom have contributed much in the formulation of the results that have been accomplished.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in connection with the services rendered by the clerk of this subcommittee, Mr. Jack K. McFall. He has been with us for a number of years. I may say without any hesitation that the committee without the services of this very fine, able clerk would be constantly in trouble with the many problems with which it is constantly confronted.

The bill before you carries appropriations for the Department of State, the Department of Justice and the judiciary, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Labor. Over 200 paragraphs of appropriations were considered in connection with the committee's deliberations. Many of these paragraphs were divided into subitems, each of which required careful consideration.

Knowing how uninteresting a recitation of figures can become, I shall limit my remarks to certain general observations of the activities of the departments that I think will be of most interest to the Members of the House. If, at the conclusion of my remarks, or at any time during the reading of the bill for amendment, Members may desire information on any of the different services provided for in the bill, I shall be glad to try to answer your questions.

The bill carries a total appropriation of $121,177,000, a reduction of $3,112,000 under the estimates as submitted in the Budget for the fiscal year 1938. While this sum is in excess of the appropriations for the current year by $3,373,000, I think it proper to state that this increase over the appropriations for 1937 is more than offset by the amounts that have been included in the bill for two activities, both of which I am sure the House will feel are extremely deserving and for which ample funds should be supplied.

The number of unfortunate airplane accidents that occurred with surprising frequency during the past few months has focused attention upon the need for additional safety facilities being afforded this rapidly growing medium of transportation. In order that a program of installing new aids and improving old aids to air navigation might be instituted, the Budget has recommended a program which will require the expenditure of approximately $5,000,000 over a period of 2 years. Developments in aeronautical radio have revolutionized the science of air safety. It is to keep pace with the development of science in this field that the committee has recommended an increase of approximately $2,328,000 over last year's appropriations. A large part of this sum will be devoted to the installation of radio beams, additional radio stations, high-frequency radio location markers, and the improvement of existing radio facilities to make them more efficient and dependable.

We have also recommended an increase in the bill of $1,805,000 for grants to States for maternal and child health, services to crippled children, and child-welfare services, under the provisions of the Social Security Act. Congress has now defined a policy of social welfare and has authorized certain sums to be allotted to the States to carry out a joint Federal and State endeavor. The Appropriations Committee, therefore, unless it should choose to impair the program, has no alternative except to recommend funds sufficient to meet the amount that the various States are entitled to under the terms of the act.

These two sums that I have just mentioned total $4,133,000, which is required to meet these two well-defined needs. It will thus be seen that if the amount of $4,133,000 be deducted from the total amount as recommended in the bill, it will show a reduction of approximately $760,000 under the appropriations for the fiscal year 1937.

The committee hearings reveal the fact that some of the departments have been indulging in the practice of transferring personnel from one bureau to another for an indefinite period of time, but retaining the employee on the pay roll of the bureau from which he is transferred. Such a practice, if abused, defeats the purpose for which the funds are appropriated. Let me give an example. An employee in Bureau A will be transferred to Bureau B, but the salary of this employee will continue to be paid from the appropriation for Bureau A. Under the law these assignments may be made for a period of 3 months, and then renewed for a period of 3 months. The plain intent of the law sanctioning these transfers is to provide sufficient administrative elasticity to meet emergency conditions when they arise. In some cases, however, these employees have been carried in this transferred status for years. The report on the bill has called attention to this condition, and I am hopeful that in the future the law authorizing these temporary assignments will be complied with. I am sure Congress will always lend an attentive ear to pleas for transfer of funds from one appropriation to another if the conditions warrant. This is the proper remedy.

One of the more important changes that the committee recommends this year has to do with the consolidation of traveling-expense funds in a single appropriation for each department with a few exceptions. This policy is recommended for all traveling expense in the Department of Labor, for practically all in the Department of Commerce, and for a large part in the Department of Justice. No change is made in the State Department for the reason that practically all traveling expense for the Department proper and the Foreign Service is already confined to two separate travel-appropriation headings. The amount expended for travel by the four departments totals nearly seven and one-half million dollars. As a result of the consolidations that have been made, approximately $150,000 has been saved, and the committee is convinced that this reduction will not seriously impair a single service now being rendered by these four departments. Some years ago a uniform policy was adopted by the Appropriations Committee of placing all appropriations for printing and binding under one heading for each department. The arrangement has been entirely satisfactory, and I am certain that economies have resulted. Experience must answer for the application of the same principle to the expenditures for traveling expense.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Before entering into any discussion about the Department of State I want to commend to the Members of the House the testimony of Secretary Hull that will be found in the hearings accompanying the bill. Those of us who had the pleasure of serving with him when he was a Member of this body, I am sure, have always been impressed with his sincerity of purpose and his devotion to his ideals. His statement contains an interesting account of the problems that have beset the Department during the past fiscal year and also contain illuminating evidence on the matter that is most dear to his heart—the reciprocal-trade agreements.

FOREIGN SERVICE SALARIES

As a matter of first importance, I think the House should be acquainted with a condition that to my mind is appalling. It concerns the pay of clerks in our embassies, legations, and consulates throughout the world. During the past summer I attended a meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union for the Promotion of International Arbitration, which was held in Budapest, Hungary, as a delegate representing this Government. At the completion of the meeting of that body, I took occasion to visit several of our missions in Europe, and let me say here that that trip gave me a sense of pride at the type of representation that our Government is having in the services of our splendid corps of Foreign Service officers. In accordance with the rules of the Appropriations Committee, I submitted a report of my findings while on this trip, and, if any Members may be interested, it will be found printed in the hearings on the bill.

To get back, however, to the question of the pay of the clerks. Out of a total of over 900 of these employees, only about 30 draw in excess of $960 per year. Wherever I went I found them to be the very backbone upon which the work of the post proceeded. Many of them speak and translate fluently 4, 6, 8, even 10, foreign languages. They handle passport and citizenship work. They do expert accounting. They prepare legal documents. They interview local businessmen in the interest of promoting American trade. They adjust trade complaints. They examine prospective immigrants. In fact, there were but few types of work that they could not do; and yet I found these people compensated by our Government in a manner that prevents them from having anything but the bare necessities of life. I think this Congress should know that in one instance I was informed by a Foreign Service officer that a collection was taken up among the officers at that post to provide burial expenses for a faithful clerk who died, leaving a wife but no money whatever even for the expenses of his own interment.

After going into this question thoroughly, the committee has concluded that it would be derelict in its duty if it did not recommend that some funds be provided to at least partially remedy this distressing situation. We have therefore included in the bill about $75,000, in order that the Department may make promotions among these lower-paid employees where their efficiency is such, and their need is such, as to justify this being done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question on this very point?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Committee any information as to the percentage of American citizens among the clerks in the embassies and legations?

Mr. McMILLAN. Offhand, I am not in a position to answer the gentleman's inquiry, but I think a list of the clerks, foreign and native, in our foreign missions, is to be found in the record of the hearings.

PASSPORT DIVISION

With the revival of business, the Passport Agency of the State Department continues to show a progressive increase in work. The applications for passports are running over 30 percent more than last year. An increase of $5,000 for the maintenance of the Passport Bureau has been recommended to take care of this unit that is so ably administrated by Mrs. Ruth Shipley.

DIVISION OF TRADE AGREEMENTS

At the time the hearings were held on the bill Congress had not authorized the continuance of the reciprocal-trade program. As a result, the amount carried for the personnel that administer the work connected with the negotiation of treaties was reduced by about $140,000. Since then the bill has become law, authorizing the continuance of the treaty work, so a supplemental estimate for funds to pay salaries of additional employees will doubtless be submitted to Congress before the expiration of the present session.

FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

We have allowed sufficient funds to employ 20 additional Foreign Service officers. Many posts in the Service are undermanned. Some have but one officer assigned to duty. At these posts the leave problem is always acute, and sometimes it is not possible to fully comply with the leave laws. This condition will be largely remedied and all of the candidates who successfully passed the last examination given by the State Department can be inducted into the Service.

Continuing the program instituted by the committee last year to bring home officers who have not been back to the United States for many years, we are providing $110,000 for this purpose during the next fiscal year. We feel that it is important that these men be brought back to their home country at reasonable intervals, not only in order that they may not lose touch with America but also that they may familiarize themselves with the business and economic conditions of the country in general, and of their own department in particular.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES

Funds have been provided in the bill for three conferences to be held in 1938—the Eighth International Conference of American States at Lima, Peru; the Telecommunication Conference, Cairo, Egypt; and the Aviation Conference, likewise at Lima, Peru. Our participation in these conferences is a matter of treaty obligation.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION

Three separate amounts totaling $2,525,000 will be found in the bill under the heading of the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico. The three objects of expenditure are for the rectification work along the Rio Grande, flood control, and construction of a diversion dam. All of these projects come under the head of public works and are, of course, authorized by existing law or treaty with Mexico. There will still remain to be appropriated about $4,900 000 if all the work either authorized or in progress is to be completed in accordance with existing plans. We have omitted an appropriation of $1,100,000 to commence canalization work on the upper Rio Grande.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AND THE JUDICIARY

Attorney General Cummings appeared before the committee and gave us a very interesting picture of the work of his Department, which you will find in the hearings. The committee is recommending that you approve an appropriation of $39,380,000 for the Department of Justice and the judiciary. If you concur in our recommendation you will have reduced the appropriation of the current year by $1,976,000 and the estimates by $883,689.

Certain consolidations of appropriations have been made looking to affording a greater degree of administrative freedom in the expenditure of moneys, while some appropriations previously carried in lump sum have been broken down in their component parts and have been carried as separate items. The effect of the latter is, of course, to place a greater degree of legislative control over the expenditures. I will not bore you by going into all the details of these changes, but if any Member is particularly interested I may refer you to the report on the bill, which explains everything that has been done in this connection.

In keeping with the ever-growing volume of work in the Department resulting in some degree from the imposition of additional duties necessitated by the new crime laws passed by Congress, we have allowed increases where it was felt the facts warranted. For example, in the criminal and the tax divisions, where the load appears to be the heaviest, $40,000 additional has been allowed for each division. The request for additional attorneys in the antitrust work has been approved. It appears that their difficulties have grown not so much out of the fact that they have additional litigation but that the litigation that they now have is of such an involved nature as to require the services of many more attorneys to properly handle the work.

BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

I now desire to take a few moments to tell you about a bureau that by its capable direction and remarkable results has captured the fancy of the American people. I refer to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Let me suggest to you new Members, and the old Members as well, that it would be well worth your time to go down and visit this Bureau in the Department of Justice. I am sure you will come away with the knowledge that you have witnessed one of the most efficiently operated units in our entire Government.

The growth of this Bureau has been phenomenal. In the identification unit nearly 7,000,000 fingerprints are on file, from which over 400,000 identifications were made last year. Over 10,000 law-enforcement agencies regularly contribute to the fingerprint collection, which is growing at the rate of 4,400 per day. Over 5,700 fugitives from justice were identified during last year. Outgoing letters increased 50 percent in the course of a year. I could continue citing these statistics to indicate this tremendous growth, but I am unable to take the time. I am, however, greatly concerned about the welfare of the employees working in the Bureau. During 1936 these employees performed over 110,000 hours of overtime. It seems that the volume of work is always a pace ahead of the appropriations to carry it on. The committee has recommended an increase of $75,000 over the Budget for this Bureau. If you approve our action, it will make available $6,000,000 for the fiscal year 1938. While I am certain this will not provide the complete solution to this problem of overtime work, it should at least somewhat relieve present conditions. The Mattson kidnaping case has drawn heavily upon the manpower resources of the Bureau, and when it is considered that there are over 15,000 cases pending, of which over 8,000 are unassigned, I am sure the House will sustain the action of the committee in increasing the appropriation.

PENAL INSTITUTIONS

I want to take this opportunity to express my own feeling, as well as what I think to be that of the committee, at the loss the Government has sustained in the resignation of Mr. Sanford Bates, former Director of Prisons. He was an exceptional administrator, always cooperating 100 percent with the committee in working out our common problems. The Federal penal service today is a monument to his ability and devotion to his task. I may add, however, that the Government is fortunate to secure the services of Mr. James Bennett, who succeeded Mr. Bates and who had worked as his assistant for many years.

Unfortunately for the country, the prison population continues to grow, and hence the problem of supplying proper housing facilities for the prisoners is ever present. In order that the parole system might be strengthened we have allowed several of the existing institutions additional parole officers and clerks. Additional guards have likewise been provided at the different prisons, both for the purpose of complying with the leave law passed at the last session of Congress and for affording increased guard facilities commensurate with the increase in population.

The probation system has had an astonishing growth in the 10 years of its existence. We are allowing 10 additional probation officers in order to reduce the average case load per officer, which averages 180 cases at the present time. In one judicial district over 900 cases are handled by one officer. No adequate supervision of probationers can be had by any officer charged with handling over 100 cases.

The Public Health Service directs all medical relief in the various penal institutions and under the able direction of Dr. Treadway adequate medical facilities are being provided.

Three new jails are in process of being constructed—one in California, one in Minnesota, and one in Florida. Their completion will somewhat relieve crowded conditions in existing institutions, as well as provide a place of incarceration for prisoners who are now cared for by contract in State and county institutions.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

I want to recommend to the new Members of the House particularly that they secure a copy of the hearings on the Department of Commerce bill and read the engrossing statement of the Secretary of Commerce contained therein. In a very succinct way he has painted a picture of all the activities of this Department. I would know of no better way for one to acquaint himself with the activity of the Department of Commerce than to diligently read Secretary Roper's remarks.

BUREAU OF AIR COMMERCE

Knowing the concern and responsibility we all have as Members of the House in providing adequate facilities to insure safety of air transportation, we have endeavored to develop most fully in the hearings the entire program the Bureau of Air Commerce proposes to do to prevent airplane disasters in the future such as have recently occurred. With the sum allowed in the bill, plus authority to obligate appropriations for next year to the extent of $2,000,000, about 212 projects will be undertaken. These projects look to either the establishment of new air-navigation aids or the modernizing or improvement of existing aids.

Traffic control at key airports is now being successfully undertaken under the Bureau's supervision, and this program will be further extended. There have been and are continuing to be such rapid developments in the field of aeronautical transportation that what is provided for today may be obsolete tomorrow.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

The committee has made certain consolidations in the appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to afford better administration. The only increase contained in the Budget is in an item to establish a division of industrial economics. The theory underlying this new division is to afford a means whereby business could be extended a governmental service similar to the aid extended agriculture by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics and to labor by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. It was proposed in order that certain economic studies desired by business might be undertaken. Among others, studies of distribution and retail prices were to be made, and some of the fund would be devoted to making an analysis of data contained in the old N. R. A. records.

The committee always questions the establishment of a new division in the Government, because once under way, it is difficult to eliminate. We were, however, impressed with the fact that some of these price and distribution studies may be desirable, so we have provided $125,000 under the regulation activities of the Bureau to undertake some of this work.

You will also find in reading the bill that we have added about $73,000 over the estimates for the division charged with the compilation of foreign-trade statistics. These statistics are compiled from the customs declarations that are filed at the various ports of entry, and have a wide and important use among businessmen engaged in exporting and importing. In addition they are used extensively, and are in fact essential today, in the negotiation of reciprocal-trade treaties. Due to the increase in trade, the present staff of the division has been unable to handle the work, although working considerable overtime. Many inaccuracies have occurred in the statistics compiled and many complaints have been received as a result. The committee has assurances from the Department that with this additional appropriation the work can be done both properly and expeditiously.

BUREAU OF THE CENSUS

The bill contains an appropriation of $2,175,000 for the operation of the Census Bureau.

In reading the bill you will find two new items, one of $25,000 for gathering age records as an aid to applicants under the Social Security Act and the other for the expenses of the Sixteenth Decennial Census, amounting to $50,000. Heretofore it has been customary to appropriate $100,000 the year previous to the taking of the decennial census for the work preparatory thereto. The Director believes, however, that this preparatory work can be more efficiently performed over a 2-year period. This explains the $50,000 item carried for this expense. A similar amount will be provided next year.

BUREAU OF STANDARDS

The only increases to be found in the regular activities of the Bureau of Standards are occasioned by reallocations of certain administrative positions by the Civil Service Commission, which creates a legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay the increased salary rates.

A new item, however, does appear under this Bureau. It deals with the investigation of building materials. The Central Housing Committee, which is composed of nine Federal agencies interested in housing problems, has recommended that the Bureau conduct a research of materials and methods of construction.

Lack of adequate facilities for this type of research has been a drawback in the Federal housing program, and inasmuch as all nine of these Federal housing agencies have enthusiastically endorsed the suggestion, the committee has recommended to the Congress an appropriation of $200,000 for research and study in this field.

BUREAU OF MARINE INSPECTION AND NAVIGATION

Four laws were passed by the last Congress designed to more adequately protect life at sea and to promote the welfare of the American seaman. To carry out these laws the bill contains an increase of $631,000.

The Government has suffered another unfortunate loss in the resignation of Mr. Joseph B. Weaver as director of this service. Under his extremely efficient management and leadership a more or less moribund organization has been given new blood, and by means of the new legislation has placed itself in a position of rendering a real service in the protection of life at sea.

Mr. Weaver has given the committee several recommendations that he feels should be adopted in the interest of the public in its relation to our shipping interests. Among these recommendations is one that a schedule of fees should be authorized for services performed by the Government to ship operators in the enforcement of regulations looking to safety of life at sea. If a schedule of fees were authorized by appropriate legislation, many hundreds of thousands of dollars in revenue would result to the Government. Such a system is now in effect in England, and I share with the committee the thought that legislation should be considered to extend the principles of the English system to our own service.

BUREAU OF LIGHTHOUSES

Over one-quarter of the total appropriation for the Department of Commerce is found under the Bureau of Lighthouses. This agency is one of the oldest in the Government. An item of $1,296,000 is recommended in the bill for 22 public-works projects. Many of the lighthouse tenders and lightships maintained by the Bureau have passed the age of usefulness. The cost of repairs to some of these antiquated vessels is out of proportion to the capital invested in them.

Under the public-works program some of these old boats will be replaced and some will be reconditioned. In addition, some of the projects look to the installation of additional aids to navigation in various lighthouse districts. I may refer you to the hearings for a complete statement as to the work to be undertaken in this regard.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

This unit of the Government devotes itself primarily to making surveys of the coasts of the United States and its Territories; determines the topography of the land under the ocean and along the shores, and engages in collecting certain basic geodetic and seismological data. In addition to preparing charts of our navigable waters, it is also engaged in the preparation of aeronautical charts. These charts are the road maps of all aviators—commercial, private, or service fliers. Inasmuch as both the charts and various photographic work done by the Bureau are of immediate interest to national defense, the committee is hopeful that the Army will cooperate with the Bureau to the extent of supplying an airplane to do this essential work.

BUREAU OF FISHERIES

In 1930 Congress passed what is known as the Jones-White Act, which authorized the construction of 34 fish hatcheries or laboratories on the basis of a 5-year program. After 20 hatcheries had been constructed up to 1932, the era of economy forced the abandonment of this program. These hatcheries, it is believed, can be constructed on an average cost of $50,000 each, and when completed can produce millions of fish available for distribution in the locality of the station. Not only do these hatcheries provide a food supply to millions of our population but there is a very definite, even though intangible, recreational value that results from this fish propagation. The committee has decided that this program of hatchery construction should be continued and that all the hatcheries authorized by the Jones-White Act be constructed under a 3-year program. We have accordingly inserted $220,000 in the bill to begin this construction program.

This should permit the building of about a third of the 12 stations and 2 laboratories that remain to be constructed under the act. We have also added $40,000 to the bill to enlarge and improve some existing hatcheries. Complaints have come to the committee that the Bureau has been unable in many instances to make delivery of fish. In order that this situation may be remedied, we have included an item of $15,000 for the purchase of trucks in order that the Bureau may transport from their hatcheries the fish they propagate.

During the current fiscal year $172,000 is recommended to make scientific investigations relating to food fishes, their habits, migration, supply, and so forth. This is certainly a modest sum when one considers the hundreds of types of food fishes, the supply of which we should protect as a measure of food conservation. The committee has added $70,000 to the amount under this head for 1938 in order to conduct investigations concerning the shad and the pilchard, the former on the Atlantic coast and the latter on the Pacific coast. Both of these studies are desired in order to secure essential facts and statistics on the habits and supply of these two species of fish.

PATENT OFFICE

The committee is always delighted to hear the evidence of the Commissioner of Patents regarding the need for funds to operate the Patent Office because this Bureau produces revenue to the Government. I think the Members of the House will be interested to know that for 12 years prior to 1933 a deficit in the operation of the Patent Office resulted each year. Since the incumbency of the present Director, Mr. Coe, however, there is a net profit to the Government of $540,000. This is an impressive record and I want the record to show that the committee is appreciative of the successful administration of this Bureau.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

I now direct your attention to the items in connection with the appropriation for the Department of Labor.

Secretary Perkins appeared before the committee and her comprehensive statement of the activities of the Department will be found in the hearings. If you eliminate from consideration the appropriation of $1,805,000, which has been added to the bill this year for grants to States under the provisions of the Social Security Act, the appropriation in the bill for 1938 would be about $6,500 under the total appropriation for the current fiscal year.

One of the proposals presented to our committee by the Budget and sponsored by the Department was to transfer from the National Youth Administration to the Division of Labor Standards, a division of personnel engaged in stimulating apprentice training in the States. There may be a great deal of merit to this program but I do not feel that work created under an emergency agency without specific sanction of law should be taken over by a permanent establishment of the Government by a rider on an appropriation bill. The Labor Committee of this House should go into this matter thoroughly, and if it is felt that the work is justified a bill can be brought in and the House can then determine as a matter of policy whether they desire this program of apprentice training to be undertaken. If the Congress does so decide, then your Appropriations Committee can determine what financial assistance should be rendered to make the work effective.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield for a question, is any report available on the work of the conciliation commissioners?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes. I think I have referred to it in the report, and I may say the hearings do reveal quite a bit of detail in connection with the conciliation commission.

SILICOSIS CONTROL

Included in the appropriation for the Division of Labor Standards and Service is an amount of $18,000 for studies aimed at the control of silicosis. Secretary Perkins feels that if all the known mechanical engineering and scientific protective measures are continued for 2 or 3 years this disease can be wiped out completely within the next 10 years. This fact has been established by a report of experts which has been submitted recommending a program for the prevention of the disease. We all cherish the hope that this much-dreaded disease will be completely conquered.

DIVISION OF PUBLIC WORKS

A new item of approximately $300,000 is carried in the bill for a new division of public contracts to enforce the provisions of the so-called Walsh-Healey Act. This represents a reduction of approximately $55,000 under the Budget estimates.

The report accompanying the bill calls attention to what the committee believes to be an erroneous interpretation of the section of the act which exempts from the operations of the statute goods that may be purchased in the open market. The decision that is ultimately made in this matter will affect materially the volume of work that the division will be called upon to perform, and the committee has requested the Department to secure a ruling from the Comptroller General on the point involved before proceeding to expend the money contained in this bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I was very much interested in the gentleman's statement with respect to the much-dreaded disease—silicosis. I notice the gentleman mentioned an appropriation of $18,000. Does the gentleman expect this disease can be conquered by an appropriation of $18,000?

Mr. McMILLAN. May I say to the gentleman the $18,000 carried in the bill is in nowise intended to be used in treating the disease. This appropriation is intended merely for purposes of investigation.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is what I want to bring out. I assumed that.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman covered the subject rather briefly. I thought it might be interesting for the RECORD if the gentleman would explain in a little more detail just what is the purpose of the $18,000 appropriation.

Mr. McMILLAN. This is merely for the purpose of conducting a scientific investigation and to undertake a study of this disease.

Mr. McCORMACK. Was a larger amount than that requested?

Mr. McMILLAN. No; the amount was allowed as requested.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS

We have approved the Budget estimate of $880,000 for the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This amounts to an increase of $30,000 over the amount available for this year. This increase will be devoted to enlarging the field covered in the collection of statistics on wages, hours of labor, working conditions, and cost of living. The testimony before the committee indicates that there is a growing demand for the basic data collected by the Bureau in the various fields and that the increase requested is justified.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE

About 40 percent of the entire appropriation for the Labor Department is expended by the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization. There has been a continuing increase in the number of applications for naturalization and it has taxed the facilities of the Bureau to keep pace with the work.

Under the act of February 5, 1917, the Secretary of Labor is authorized to draw on appropriations made for this Bureau in an amount not to exceed $200,000 "to enforce the law excluding contract laborers and induced and assisted immigrants." It has come to our attention that some of the personnel employed under this authority of law have not been devoting their time to the problems defined in the act. We have placed a limitation of $95,000 on the amount that may be expended under this authorization, and want it specifically understood that we will expect that all expenditures, if any, under this limitation will be made in accordance with the provisions of law. The hearings contain an interesting report on deportations, naturalization, seizures made, and so forth, and I recommend their reading to any Member who may be interested.

CHILDREN'S BUREAU

Now that the social-security program is being adopted by the States, we are called upon to make additional appropriations to meet the needs of States qualifying for benefits under the terms of the act. As I have stated, we are carrying an increase of $1,805,000 for these grants during the next fiscal year. The committee has likewise approved an increase of about $100,000 over appropriations for the current year for the administrative expenses of the Children's Bureau. Advice and counsel must be given the States in the formulation of their program for maternal and child health, care of crippled children, and child welfare. It is only by these studies and advice that we will get a dollar value for a dollar spent.

WOMEN'S BUREAU

A small increase of $1,800 has been allowed over the budget for this Bureau in order that it might extend its investigations touching on the welfare of women in industry. Studies are being made of hours, wages, employment conditions, health standards, and so forth, of women, with a view to improving their standards in the economic and industrial field.

UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

The United States Employment Service was set up under the terms of the Wagner-Peyser Act which was designed to establish a joint State and Federal employment service. Only 3 States of the 48 have not yet actually accepted the act and 37 States have already become affiliated with the Service. During the past 3 years over 8,700,000 applications for positions have been filed in the States affiliated with the Service and over 5,000,000 placements have actually been made. The Service has established a system of job classification in all of the major industries so that scientific selection of personnel may be made. A veterans' placement representative is maintained in each affiliated State in order to give especial consideration to veterans who are seeking employment. Another specialized branch of the Bureau is a farm placement service that assists in supplying farm labor in the agricultural States. The bill carries an appropriation of $925,000 for administrative expenses for this service and $1,500,000 for payments to the States. These sums represent a saving under the Budget estimates of $25,000 and $90,000, respectively.

In closing I desire to thank the House for its courteous attention to my remarks and to express the hope that you will join me in supporting the recommendations of the committee for the appropriations which have been included in the bill for the next fiscal year. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I compliment the gentleman and the members of the subcommittee on the splendid report they have made on the pending items?

May I ask the gentleman particularly about the increased funds which would be made available for air-navigation aid? I do this because in my own State of West Virginia we have during the past 4 years attempted by every possible and rightful means to secure funds from the Bureau of Air Commerce for the erection of radio-beam stations and air beacons in the State of West Virginia. I may say to the gentleman and to the committee we have been unable to get a single improvement in our State of this type.

Today the American Airlines is operating passenger service daily both east and west from Washington to Elkins, Charleston, the capital of West Virginia, Cincinnati, and Chicago, yet on that line not a single radio beam or beacon has been established by the Bureau of Air Commerce between Washington and Cincinnati.

I do not believe the failure of the Bureau to give us this vital and needed navigation aids for our aviation travel has been because of the Bureau's failure to understand the problem. I believe it is largely because of lack of funds. May I ask the chairman whether in connection with this increased appropriation for air-navigation aids material was brought before the committee indicating such a territory would receive aid?

Mr. McMILLAN. I may say I think the gentleman may look forward to a brighter day so far as his territory is concerned. The committee has included a substantial increase, $2,328,000, over the current budget for the next fiscal year, and has also authorized the Bureau to incur contract obligations of some $2,000,000 next year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I say that with this $5,000,000 program for installation and improvements of airway aids the Bureau of Air Commerce feels there will be 212 projects undertaken in order of priority. I am unable to tell the gentleman from West Virginia where his State or his projects stand with respect to that list of priorities, but it is estimated this $5,000,000 program for the next fiscal year will provide for some 212 projects which have been submitted by the Bureau.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not want to get into a technical discussion, but I do want to say that West Virginia, almost at the Nation's Capitol door and a rugged mountain section over which to fly, has not a single radio-beam station, which shows the importance of the item to which the gentleman has just referred.

I also wish to mention in this connection the fact the air route traveled by transport planes running from Washington to Pittsburgh to Detroit has changed in recent years, yet the Department has been unable to change its radio beacons from the old routes to the new routes. I refer to the pressing need for such a facility at Martinsburg, W. Va.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman made an extremely fine statement.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am very grateful to my friend the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am very pleased the committee has increased the appropriation for the Foreign Service. I know our Foreign Service officials do a splendid work.

I notice the committee has added to the appropriation for men going into the Consular Service.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I also notice in the report the committee saw the lack of coordination between the Department of State and the Department of Commerce. Does the gentleman feel he can tell us what this means?

Mr. McMILLAN. I may say in that connection there has recently been perfected between the two departments certain amendments to the coordination agreement, and it is hoped that with this new agreement the work may be expedited and the two departments will not have what I have always regarded as an apparent conflict or overlapping of duties.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I have been very much interested in both departments. I think the Department of Commerce does what the Department of State's foreign service cannot do, perhaps, more in a business way.

Mr. McMILLAN. This new agreement will, in my judgment, eliminate a great deal of this overlapping and duplication.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the appropriation for labor statistics provide money for a census of the number of children employed in industry all over the country?

Mr. McMILLAN. My understanding is the Bureau contemplates taking care of that item at some later time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am delighted.

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mr. FLANNERY. I wish to compliment the gentleman and the members of the committee for their manner of handling this measure, and also to compliment the gentleman on his dissertation, and in view of the charges and countercharges of lax supervision, and political interference in respect of the Bureau of Air Commerce, may I ask the gentleman whether the pending bill has a provision to transfer the jurisdiction of that Bureau to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. McMILLAN. There has been nothing before the committee on that point. There may be something pending in the other body about it, but so far as our committee is concerned, the question was not raised, and I am not in position at this time to tell the gentleman what, if anything, may be undertaken in that respect.

Mr. FLANNERY. Am I correct in assuming that the Bureau of Air Commerce does not have the authority to issue a decree for the regulation of air traffic or to enforce such a decree if made?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Bureau of Air Commerce does initiate and promulgate such regulations, and, of course, when they are promulgated, they enforce them.

Mr. FLANNERY. The reason I asked the question is because I was talking with Mr. St. Clair, of the Department of Commerce, this morning with reference to one of the American air lines, to be specific, and was informed they could recommend to the Post Office Department but could make no decrees or exercise any regulations.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; the regulatory features of the Air Commerce Act are under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce and are enforced and administered by the Bureau of Air Commerce.

Mr. FLANNERY. If the authority were transferred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the opinion of the committee, that would not change your views with respect to these appropriations?

Mr. McMILLAN. It would not.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes at this time, and I do this because I cannot refrain from congratulating the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMILLAN] on one of the ablest presentations of an appropriation bill it has been my pleasure to listen to before this body. [Applause.]

I may add that not a single partisan or political question arose at any time during the hearings or the discussion of this bill before our subcommittee.

This is a unanimous report of the subcommittee, and I concur 100 percent in everything that the gentleman from South Carolina has said. The gentleman has been a splendid chairman of our subcommittee and is one of the most conscientious, hard-working men we have in this body. [Applause.] I commend the gentleman for the splendid work he has done and for the very enlightening and comprehensive statement he has just completed before the Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL].

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein three tables compiled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, on January 8, 1937, the Postmaster General of the United States was quoted by the Associated Press, in part, as follows:

James A. Farley's Post Office Department went $88,316,324 into the red last fiscal year, but Farley hastened to explain yesterday free mail for Congressmen and other "nonpostal items" were largely responsible—

Placing the emphasis upon "free mail for Congressmen."

This statement was apparently given out at a press conference through newspaper services and appeared in practically every daily newspaper, large and small, in the United States. Members of Congress know what the reaction to a statement such as this is and will be in their respective districts. The country at large is imbued with the idea that the Post Office Department would pay expenses were it not for the tremendous amount of free mail sent out by Members of Congress. This is absolutely not true.

The fact is that during the fiscal year 1936 the amount of mail franked by Members of Congress was less than 2½ percent in weight and lost revenue of the total free mail for that year. The deficit of the Post Office Department is due in a large measure to the abuse of the franking privilege, but that abuse is not by Members of Congress but by the departments of Government, practically every one of which is directly responsible to the Chief Executive and whose heads have been appointed by the Chief Executive.

I am inserting into the RECORD today tables giving the actual figures as to the number of pieces, the weight, and the lost revenue of mail franked by departments and by Members of Congress. I compiled these tables personally, every figure being taken from the annual reports of the Post Office Department, with the exception of the figures for the year 1937. The 1937 figures were taken from the testimony given by post-office officials on the Post Office appropriations bill when that bill was being considered by the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee. I have asked unanimous consent to insert into the RECORD at this point table I and table II.

FOR FISCAL YEARS ENDING JUNE 30, 1934, 1935, 1936, AND 1937 (PRESENT ADMINISTRATION)

	Number of pieces	Weight	Lost revenue

Yearly average	339,750,830	43,131,503	10,675,319

TABLE II.—Franked congressional mail

	Number of pieces	Weight	Lost revenue
		Pounds
1930	34,525,581	3,978,879	$718,060
1931	33,413,032	4,385,007	723,671
1932	38,551,744	4,418,216	778,436
1933	36,171,088	6,867,788	1,019,621
1934	20,882,779	7,724,910	775,785
1935	16,097,050	2,683,086	577,162
1936	29,747,411	3,922,109	751,579

These tables show that while congressional franking was reduced from 34,000,000 pieces in 1930 to 29,000,000 pieces in 1936—it is the 1936 deficit to which Mr. Farley refers—departmental franking has during the same time increased from 302,126,259 pieces in 1930 to 669,352,068 pieces in 1936. Departmental franking has been increased almost 100 percent in weight and nearly 300 percent in lost revenue under the present Democratic administration over the last Republican administration. By departments I mean all departments of Government, excluding only the Post Office Department itself. The reason the Post Office Department is not included is because Post Office franking is included in the postal deficit as a legitimate charge, while other departmental franking is included in the nonpostal items to which Mr. Farley refers. Taking the estimates of the Post Office Department for the year 1937, these departments will have mailed during the 4 years ending June 30, 1937, the enormous amount of 2,493,369,271 pieces of mail, or a yearly average of 623,342,232 pieces, or over 2,000,000 pieces of free mail for every working day in the year.

I wonder how many people appreciate just how large this vast amount of mail is. Let us assume that one of our postal clerks, the most expert clerk in the Postal Service, were given the job of counting and sorting it. Let us assume that he counted and sorted one piece of mail every second and worked 40 hours a week, 48 weeks in the year. If he had started counting and sorting when Abraham Lincoln signed the emancipation proclamation he would be counting yet. If he had started counting when George Washington crossed the Delaware he would be counting yet. And if he had started counting when the Pilgrim Fathers landed upon the Plymouth Rock 300 years ago he would be counting yet. And if he did not take off any holidays and took no sick leave he would finish the job in the year 2004. And all this tremendous amount of mail the departments of Government, not Congress, sent out during 4 short years.

This mail weighed 348,670,524 pounds, with a yearly average of 87,167,631 pounds, or nearly 300,000 pounds for every working day in the year. Again it is difficult to realize just how much paper it required for this enormous amount of franking. It would take 140 railroad engines, hauling 50 railroad cars, each with a 50,000-pound capacity, to haul this enormous amount of mail out of Washington. It was sent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the rock-bound coast of Maine to the sunny slopes of California, from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande, and some of it went into Canada and Mexico, Puerto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and Alaska. They sent preachers documents telling them how to kill hogs and hog killers documents telling them how to preach sermons. They told lawyers how to practice medicine and doctors how to practice law. Every conceivable kind of information was sent to the people—statistical figures that would make a certified public accountant gasp with astonishment; legal documents that even the President's proposed Supreme Court of 15 Justices would fail to construe; political propaganda of all kinds. Think of it! Three hundred and forty-eight million six hundred and seventy thousand two hundred and fifty-four pounds sent out during 4 years of the present administration, or more than 55 pieces of literature, weighing nearly 8 pounds, for every one of the 45,646,000 voters who cast their ballot in the last election.

And what did this actually cost the taxpayers of the country? The Postmaster General's Department says that there was lost in revenue $118,849,020. This is almost three times as much in lost revenue as that Department reported for these same departments during the 4 years of the last Republican administration, those figures being $42,701,274. This was a yearly average of $29,712,270 as against a yearly average in lost revenue for the last Republican administration of $10,675,319. But that does not tell the entire story. We had to pay for these 7,000 railroad carloads of paper it required to do this printing. We had to pay for the printing of this more than 348,000,000 pounds of paper. Mr. Chairman, I have asked unanimous consent to insert into the RECORD at this point a table showing the actual cost of the paper and printing and the lost revenue for the period from July 1, 1933, to July 1, 1937—table III.

TABLE III.—Departmental franking (not including Post Office Department)

LOST REVENUE PLUS COST OF PAPER AND PRINTING FOR PERIOD FROM JULY 1, 1933, TO JULY 1, 1937

Lost revenue	$118,849,020
Cost of 348,670,523 pounds of paper, at 0.0695 cent per pound	24,232,601
Cost of printing 348,670,523 pounds of paper at 0.2133 cent per pound	74,371,422
Total lost revenue and cost of franking from July 1, 1933, to July 1, 1937	217,453,043
Annual cost	54,363,260

The Government Printing Office informs us that the average cost of paper they buy is .0695 cents per pound. Using those figures, the paper alone cost $24,232,601. The Printing Office purchased last year 82,414,682 pounds of paper, and the total cost of all printing by the Government Printing Office in 1936 was $18,756,268, or 0.2133 cents per pound. While some of the Department paper was mimeographed, the statement was made before a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee recently that mimeographing is more expensive than printing because departmental labor is higher. Taking this method of computing the cost—and it is the only method I know of—of printing this 348,670,524 pounds of paper it cost the taxpayers another $74,371,422. Parenthetically, if anyone, either here or in the departments, knows of any better way of figuring this cost of printing, I would be pleased to have him place those figures in the RECORD.

The table shows the total amount of lost revenue, cost of printing, and cost of paper for the 4-year period from July 1, 1933, to July 1, 1937, to be the enormous sum of $217,453,042, or an annual cost of $54,363,260. In other words, 7,000 railroad carloads of free mail cost the taxpayers $217,000,000 in 4 years. This is almost three times as much as the lost revenue and cost for the similar service during the period from July 1, 1929, to July 1, 1933, or during the preceding Republican administration. Conceding that there is a legitimate increase due to new agencies and new departments, no increase of 300 percent can be justified by anyone. That there is an enormous amount of political franking and semipolitical franking by the departments in their work must be conceded. Allowing an increase of 100 percent over the cost of the last administration there would be approximately $72,000,000 that must be conceded either political or semipolitical franking. This amount equals nearly $3 for every Democratic vote cast in the last Presidential election. It is 10 times as large as the entire Republican campaign fund spent by the national committee during that election. In view of this $72,000,000 of political and semipolitical propaganda sent out to the public at large, it is amazing that the Republican Party was able to carry even Maine and Vermont.

Compare this with the 2.5 percent of the total amount of franking sent out by Members of Congress during the year 1936, to which Mr. Farley refers in his newspaper interview.

I listened closely to the wonderful praise given and the glowing tributes paid James A. Farley at the recent banquet given by the Democratic Party in his honor, and again at the big ovation that was tendered him at the $100-a-plate feast which was held 2 weeks ago. Much was said about the wonderful leadership of Chairman Farley in that campaign. I listened carefully, but in vain, to hear one word of praise for this wonderful contribution of $72,000,000 worth of political propaganda contributed by a Postmaster General, James A. Farley, at public expense, to Chairman James A. Farley, of the National Democratic Committee. And now Postmaster General James A. Farley has the colossal nerve to broadcast over the entire Nation, through the various news services, that the 1936 postal deficit was largely due to congressional franking. James A. Farley, the Postmaster General, should place the responsibility for the postal deficit upon James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee. That is where it belongs. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman talked about the cost of distribution in poundage, but did not talk about the value of that propaganda and remind us that it took a lot of it to send checks, did it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. ENGEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the plan to enlarge the United States Supreme Court reaches deeply into the fundamental principles of the American system of government. The question should not be a partisan one. It transcends the importance of any political party or political considerations. Democrats, Republicans, Progressives, and Farm-Laborites have taken up the cudgel against the plan.

I am opposed to the proposal because, in my judgment, it is designed to make a political football out of that Court and avoid the orderly process of changing the Constitution by amendments.

I am in sympathy with any move to increase efficiency and expedite action in the Federal courts, but insofar as the Supreme Court is concerned, that tribunal is not behind on its docket and the records show that decisions are customarily handed down within 2 or 3 weeks.

Enlargement of the Supreme Court would simply mean more Judges participating in each decision and would not mean more decisions. Obviously the plan is not designed to speed up the Court.

HOW DOES THE AGE ARGUMENT FIT INTO THE PICTURE?

Being a young man, I naturally like to see young men taking an active part in the affairs of government. But neither youth nor advanced years can be used as exclusive yardsticks of a man's mentality, his capacity for work, or his usefulness.

The President himself has refuted the age argument by his own actions. In the first place, two members of the Cabinet are over 70.

Furthermore, the records of the United States Civil Service Commission show that the President has signed 103 Executive orders since 1933 exempting that number of civil employees—all past 70—from retirement.

The President, therefore, has no fears of age itself. This argument is merely used as a club with which to beat the Supreme Court.

Nine influential Members of the Senate already are past 70, and 12 Members of the House have attained that age. In the House five additional Members will pass 70 during the coming year. If a man of 70 is not equipped to interpret the law, as the "court kickers" contend, men of 70 certainly are not equipped to make the law.

No one can recall the decisions and services of John Marshall, of Mr. Justice Holmes, of Justice Brandeis, and successfully contend that age was the criterion of their viewpoints. Retirement at age of 70 would have deprived the Nation of 20 years of Justice Holmes' services; would have shortened the judicial career of Marshall by nearly one-third; would have cut Mr. Brandeis' judicial service in half.

Since presence on the Court of Justices past 70 does not, and apparently has not, impeded its work, this question would appear to have no genuine or material bearing upon the present controversy.

These facts prove that the elements of age and speeding up cases are removed from the question at hand.

The whole thing resolves itself into one perfectly plain question that need not be confused with fancy words or high-sounding phrases:

Shall the Supreme Court be turned into the personal organ of any President?

Senator LA FOLLETTE and others have clearly acknowledged the truth of this purpose. They make no bones about it now, although the same degree of frankness was not shown in the beginning. In answer to this question I say no. Personally, I do not believe that any President, whether he be Republican, Democrat, Socialist, or what-have-you, should be permitted to make our courts his servants. If the Nation wants one man, whoever it may be, to control the policy and action of all three branches of government, then why not simply eliminate Congress and the Court?

If one group can take political control of the Court now, there is nothing to stop another group from doing the same thing another time. The result is that the Court becomes a political football, to be kicked back and forth, and the country ceases to have an independent judiciary.

If this purpose is accomplished, confidence in the integrity of the law will be undermined, reaching and penalizing all the courts of the Nation.

POLITICAL FORCE OR ORDERLY GOVERNMENT?

When men in high places deliberately tear down confidence in our courts, when they sow seeds of distrust and disrespect, is it any wonder that the country reaps a harvest of lawlessness? Is it any wonder that we witness defiance of law and order?

And if we who make the laws close our eyes to the defiance and the truth of this statement, we must share the blame.

The entire American court system stands at the crossroads. Shall political force prevail—or orderly government?

Recent events are strengthening the determination of thinking citizens of the Nation to stand by their courts; to insist upon the rule of law rather than the rule of mobs.

In considering this court enlargement plan, may I suggest a couple of homely comparisons:

First. It would be like a football game for which a majority of the referees and umpires had been chosen with an advance understanding that they would render all their decisions in favor of one team.

Second. The American people frequently cry, "Kill the umpire", but when it is all said and done, they abide by his decisions. If they want to change the rules, they do it in the orderly way and not merely at the dictation of the pitcher on the mound or the quarterback on the field at the moment.

Third. Getting back to the courtroom, how fair do you think it would be if you had to enter a case in your local court in which the prosecutor had most of the jurors "in his pocket", so to speak?

IS THERE MERIT IN THE CLAIM THAT IT TAKES TOO LONG TO SECURE ACTION ON A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT?

Here again the answer is "no." It is not a long-drawn-out process, as some would have you believe, when the force of public opinion is behind the proposal. If the force of public opinion does not support the measure, then it can only be said that the will of the people has been expressed in keeping with our plan of democracy.

The contention that amendments take too long has been artfully developed upon the basis of the child-labor amendment. Let us face the facts. This amendment was originally considered and rejected by 35 States. Now it is being reconsidered. New York State has not yet approved it. Ohio did so but recently.

As the gentleman from New York said a few days ago:

In all, the Constitution has been amended 21 times thus far. The first 10, of course, were approved practically in one group. Counting all the 21 ratifications and grouping the first 10 in 1 unit, we find that the average time between submission and ratification is 1 year and 7 months.

The twenty-first amendment, repealing the prohibition amendment, was ratified within less than 10 months after submission to the people. The thirteenth amendment, which grew out of public issues raised by the Civil War, was approved in about the same amount of time. The seventeenth amendment, providing for direct election of United States Senators, was ratified within approximately 1 year; the women's suffrage amendment within less than 18 months; and the so-called "lame duck" amendment, proposed by Senator NORRIS, in 11 months.

The last five amendments have come within the present era of rapid communication, and each of them has been ratified in just about a year.

In view of these facts, just ask yourself if the talk of delay is a justifiable excuse for rejecting the method prescribed by the Constitution itself for the purpose of making it responsive to the requirements of the times and the people's needs.

If the President wants honest, orderly, well-considered court reform; if he is not aiming at political control—then he should submit the enlargement plan to the people in the orderly American way, by giving them a chance to act upon a constitutional amendment based upon logic and not upon emotion or purely political grounds.

The people themselves have set up the constitutional requirements of government, and to ignore them would mean disobedience to the rules they have made. If they want to change the rules, they have the right and the method for doing it through constitutional amendments—which, after all, simply means the people's right to govern themselves.

CAN THE LAST ELECTION BE LOOKED UPON AS THE MANDATE OF THE PEOPLE IN SUPPORT OF THIS MOVE TO ENLARGE THE COURT?

This question has been raised and may now be in the minds of many people. The answer is found in the platform upon which the Chief Executive ran. It pledged the use of constitutional amendments submitted to the people. It is likewise answered by the great galaxy of courageous Senators and Members of Congress who have loyally supported his policies and who now believe in them, but who also oppose this enlargement of the Court. It is answered again in the minds of millions of citizens who were convinced that nothing of this kind was in mind or would be attempted.

Many of them are now asking why the proposal was not brought out in the open then.

If the last election could in any way be interpreted as a mandate in favor of this Court proposal, there should certainly be no fear in submitting an amendment to the people.

In the last election the Nation accepted a 27-to-17 decision with sportsmanship and tranquillity. Had it been a 27-to-25 decision, the result would have been the same. There was no talk of a revolution, no wolf cries of "crisis", no wail about a split decision.

Recovery was proclaimed then. If the claim was true, why all this sudden need for haste; why all these vague threats of crisis?

If acting on a political basis, the opponents of the President should be the first to condemn the Supreme Court for declaring a closed season on the N. R. A. bird; they should be downright mad because the Court took Top Sergeant Johnson's punch-drunk parrot off the President's window sill.

ABOVE PARTISANSHIP

The talk of a mandate or of narrow partisan opposition is carried to a more conclusive point of absurdity when we stop to think of the great Democratic newspapers opposed to this Court proposal.

I myself have counted 72 of them in the last few days. The Plain Dealer, in Cleveland, Ohio, is a notable example. It has long been an effective supporter of New Deal legislation. No one can say that partisanship prompts its present effective and important opposition to the Court plan. The same thing can be said of Scripps-Howard papers, the New York Times, the Cincinnati Enquirer, the Brooklyn Eagle, the Birmingham (Ala.) Herald, the Galveston News, the Memphis Commercial, and hundreds of others all over the country. They supported the President's legislation; they oppose his Court plan with equal vigor and courage.

In its March 5 editorial, the Cleveland Plain Dealer says, the President—

> Uses the figure of the three-horse team of the American system of government, which must "pull together" if the field is to be plowed.
> To us it seems that one member of the three-horse team is conspiring with another member of the team to reduce the third horse to a position of complete subserviency. Two of the three want to do all the planning, going whither they will and when, while the third member is merely to go along where its teammates wish, whipped into complete submission.

Ohio has two Senators. They both belong to the same party. Senator BULKLEY favors the plan and Senator DONAHEY opposes it. Certainly no one could properly belittle Senator DONAHEY's position with a cry of partisanship.

Virtually upon its submission Senator BULKLEY endorsed the Court-control plan. Since then he has made a radio speech by which he sought to add to the fog around the issue, for nowhere in his discourse was there a paragraph which so clearly stated the real purpose of the proposal as did the two sentences of Senator LA FOLLETTE, when he said:

> Of course the President's proposal will affect the decisions of the Supreme Court.
> It was intended to do exactly that.

On the other hand, Senator DONAHEY stated his opposition to the plan in the following words:

> This entire controversy vitally affects the judiciary, the coordinate branch of the Government, and should be referred to the people—the source of all political power.

The Supreme Court has not issued a prohibition against humane legislation. It has ruled that one Congress must resort to constitutional means of accomplishing these and any other purposes, the same as every other Congress has been required to do.

DELUGE OF DECEPTION

The deluge of deception which has characterized this movement from the beginning makes any thoughtful person question the motives behind it all.

According to recent arguments, one should believe the Supreme Court is responsible for the depression, the drought, the floods, the recent wave of influenza, and Aunt Sarah's corns. Maybe those of us in northern Ohio who are interested in the Cleveland baseball club have overlooked the possibility that the Court was responsible for the fact that the Indians failed to win the pennant in 1936.

Said Raymond Moley—and we all know who he is:

> I should welcome the opportunity to speak to the man of whom we heard Thursday evening; to the man who, in the sweat of his brow, piles sandbags on the levee at Cairo. And, if I spoke to him, I would say that there is no evidence whatsoever that the Supreme Court has ever placed obstacles in the way of flood control. I would tell him, too, that there is no evidence whatsoever that the Supreme Court stands, or has stood, in the way of the efforts of the Federal Government to provide work for the unemployed, to protect home owners and farm owners from foreclosure, to guarantee the safety of bank deposits, to expand credit or restrict it, to protect the small investor on the stock exchange, to adjust the value and nature of the currency, or to do any one of many other things in the interest of the little fellow.

Only one important New Deal law—the Wagner Labor Relations Act—is now in danger in the courts. The administration apparently has a court-proof substitute for A. A. A. in the present soil-conservation law, which is adequate to deal with the Dust Bowl. The biggest project which the Supreme Court will not allow the New Deal is another N. R. A., and six new judges could not make that constitutional, for the Supreme Court was unanimous upon it.

PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

The most terrible error of all, to my humble way of thinking, is the deliberate misrepresentation used to show that the Supreme Court is the device of privilege, of position, of wealth. If it were, I would be in favor of throwing it out the window entirely, not merely these halfway measures.

Instead, the protection which this tribunal has afforded to humble, deserving citizens, who had no other source of protection, constitutes the main reason why I am willing to fight for its independence.

The safeguards of an independent judiciary are not simply the protection of one moment or one set of circumstances. They are the guaranties which, at all times and under all circumstances, preserve the rights of a people and keep a nation free.

Has this been true of the United States Supreme Court? Has it preserved the human rights of the great masses of our common people or has it been a tool of the mighty, scorning the plight and privileges of the humble citizen?

For the answers to these questions let us consider some of its decisions.

Take the Scottsboro case, for example. Local courts, State courts, and all along the line, those three obscure colored men were beaten. They had neither wealth nor power. And it remained for the United States Supreme Court to protect their rights. When they did this it was not only a decision for those three men but the guaranty of a free and fair trial to every colored person in the United States; and the same to any other citizen, regardless of class, creed, or race.

Time after time the Supreme Court has protected the legal rights of organized labor, including the right of strike and peaceful picketing. Mr. PETTENGILL, the gentleman from Indiana, cited these cases in detail in his eloquent radio broadcast last Saturday evening. He stated that the Supreme Court has decided 80 out of 100 of such cases in protection of labor.

Yet some of the leaders of this group are asking their followers to uphold the enlargement of the Court. Is it not significant that many of the foremost friends of labor legislation are vigorously opposed to the move?

The device of wrapping up this Supreme Court proposal in the same bundle with the aims of farm legislation or labor legislation seems a rather far cry from the true picture when you think of the fact that many of the men in the Senate and House who have carried the brunt of the fight for years in behalf of farm and labor legislation are among the most bitter opponents of the plan to control the Court.

Then let us take a look at the protection afforded to foreign-language groups.

In 1923 the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional an act of the State Legislature of Nebraska prohibiting the teaching of certain foreign languages in the schools. Every foreign-language group in the country should be interested in this decision.

In 14 cases involving denominational and private schools, the precious birthright of religious freedom in America, which belongs to all religious beliefs alike, has been preserved. This right was attacked in 22 different States. Attorneys representing every religious denomination helped fight for this protection in the Supreme Court. Another human right was saved for all citizens.

In 1924 the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional an Oregon statute requiring every child between 8 and 16 years of age to be sent to a public school. Speaking for the Court in this case, Mr. Justice McReynolds said, in part:

> We think it entirely plain that the act unreasonably interferes with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control.

In 1926 the Supreme Court ruled that a Federal officer cannot make a lawful search of a person's premises under a warrant invalid under the Federal law, even though it might comply with the State law.

The Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a Texas statute providing that "in no event shall a Negro be eligible to participate in a Democratic Party election."

The Supreme Court held unconstitutional a Minnesota statute which forbade creameries to buy cream at higher prices at one place than at another.

The Supreme Court held unconstitutional the Kansas Criminal Syndicalism Act and said that the act could not, in the absence of violence or crime, be applied against a person who sought to persuade people to become members of a branch of the Industrial Workers of the World.

The Supreme Court declared unconstitutional arrests and seizures without warrant made by New York State troopers.

The Supreme Court has ruled that a Negro on trial is entitled to have the jurors asked whether they have racial prejudice which might prevent the giving of a fair and impartial verdict.

The Supreme Court in the case coming up from Alabama ruled that it is unconstitutional for a person to be convicted of a criminal offense in a trial where he has been deprived of assistance of counsel. In another case coming up from Alabama the Supreme Court said the systematic exclusion of Negroes from grand jury and trial duty in cases of criminal action against Negroes constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the law.

PRINCES OF PRIVILEGE?

The people involved in these cases are not "Princes of Privilege" except insofar as the humblest American citizen is the "prince" of his own domain of freedom and liberty. In talking about threats against these privileges of the humblest kind of citizens, no one may say, "It can't happen here." These cases show it has happened here.

These examples are endless. More than a political doctrine is at stake. I do not accuse the President of having designs against any one of these rights, but I do say that one group may use authority wisely; another may intend to, yet fail; and still another may use exactly the same power with no good intentions and with results utterly disastrous.

If the Nation will permit the abandonment of the orderly processes of government and depend upon varying political and emotional winds to determine the legality of laws, we might easily find ourselves in a position where any law, the right of free speech, trial by jury, religious freedom, free assemblage—a piece of labor or farm legislation—was held operative one minute and inoperative the next, depending upon the changing swing of the moment. Any law now in existence or hitherto written would be menaced by such a condition. There will be no stability if the legality of legislation is left to these shifting winds of emotion and politics.

The issue today is to save the Nation from disrespect of courts and from one-man government—now or henceforth—no matter who that one man may be.

An independent judiciary, free from manipulation, free from political control, is the priceless safeguard of every American citizen against the encroachments of all groups at all times. My plea is, do not let down the bars. Keep the American court system independent from political control. [Applause.]

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. It is with interest that I have listened to the able address made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] upon the President's proposal to reorganize the Federal judiciary. The gentleman prefaced his address by advising the House and the country that the proposed reorganization is an American issue and not a partisan one. In this declaratory and patriotic statement I heartily concur. And yet it is a curious thing to note that not a single Republican in the House of Representatives or in the Senate or any Republican of note throughout the Nation has endorsed the President's plan. And when one considers the subject matter from that angle, he may reach the conclusion that from the standpoint of Republican politics the question is partisan. This thought is corroborated by a number of letters and petitions that I have received through the mail from my constituents wherein local Republican politicians are leading the way in denouncing the President's judiciary program. It is a difficult thing for me to challenge the sincerity of one's motives upon any question, and yet, knowing some of the "dyed in the wool" reactionary Republicans in my own district who are moving heaven and earth to see that I am properly informed upon this question, I am constrained to conclude that these gentlemen are basing their conclusions solely upon the ground of partisan politics.

Let me advise my colleagues that I have not completed my research work upon the great problem before us. My mind is still open as to what is the best thing to do under present conditions and circumstances as they may affect the future state of the Union. At this juncture let me say firmly and from a heart chiseled with sincerity that my final decision upon the subject before us will be made in the interests of what I believe to be best for the future of my country. I proclaim here and now that the question of self, political expediency, and party or partisan loyalty shall be submerged in what I conceive to be for the best interests of this great Government of ours and the country of the future which I love and revere. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we are now discussing the appropriation bill for the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments; and I cannot help but commend the chairman of the subcommittee and the other members of the subcommittee for trying to hold down these various departments, even though the appropriation bill this year is $3,373,405 over that of last year. It is a difficult task for the Appropriation subcommittees to hold down Congress on its spending spree, because Congress makes the laws that require so much Federal spending; however, the Appropriation Committee can function greatly in holding down the departments by not granting the amount they ask for.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to spend my 15 minutes this afternoon in talking upon this bill. I have taken as my text this afternoon, "Spend less, tax more, or 'bust'!" In 15 minutes I could not do justice to that subject, so I am going to spend most of my time this afternoon upon the subject "Spend less." I was very much interested in hearing the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] take the floor this afternoon and give you a résumé of the spending of this Government. Some more Democrats evidently want to know the answer to where are you going to get the money? It seems to be the desire and the idea of Members of Congress that all they are sent here for is to get money for their districts, and that the more money they can have spent in their districts will be the measure of determining whether they are good Congressmen or not, without regard to the welfare of the Nation as a whole. Sometimes it seems to me that Members of Congress fail to appreciate, as was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois a few minutes ago, that this is America, and I am an American first before I am a partisan; I do not care whether that means Democrat or Republican. The Members of Congress must now look to the things we are trying to do from the broad viewpoint of whether we are American citizens or are partisans, where one is doing something as a Member of Congress for his own district and that is all. God forbid that I shall ever stoop so low as to be only a Republican when the welfare of America is at stake, and I think we are today in the most critical period of American history.

Mr. Chairman, someone in this country of ours in public office is responsible for this great expenditure of funds. Who is the first man? He is the President of the United States. He is the first man who is responsible. In my judgment, who is the second man? The Speaker of the House is the second man. And in turn, who is the third man? The third man is the majority leader. They are the men who are responsible for keeping down Government expenses. Yet what have they done to curb expenses? Then we come down to the various chairmen of committees, who are spending these vast, fabulous sums. They are responsible for the laws that we are passing. Most of the chairmen come from the Southern States. They are the men who are responsible for what we are doing in Congress. Then you have a body at the other end of the Capitol called the Senate. They must assume their responsibility. A funny thing happened a few minutes ago. I was called to my office, and over there a wool salesman named Worthington, from Philadelphia, was showing me some wool. I said to this salesman, "There is somebody in this country who is pulling the wool over the eyes of the American people, and who is also pulling the wool over the eyes of the Congressmen. Who is that man? Who is the man that is responsible mostly for these enormous expenditures of funds?" When I get through with my quotations, judge for yourself who is pulling the wool over your eyes. I want to quote to you this afternoon from the man who is mostly responsible for the vast Government expenditures. First I quote from the Democratic platform, 1932:

> We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagances, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent of the cost of the Federal Government.

The President of the United States said that he was for that platform 100 percent. That same President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his acceptance speech, July 2, 1932, made this statement:

> For 3 long years I have been going up and down this country preaching that government costs too much. I cannot stop the preaching.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States for the last 3 years has forgotten all about that statement. He has not said anything lately about reducing governmental expenses. In my judgment, all he thinks about is spending more, spending more. At least he has not tried to stop it; or he could if he wanted to.

Let me quote again from the President's speech of October 19, 1932:

> That (the Hoover spending), my friends, * * * is the most reckless and extravagant pace I have been able to discover in the statistical record of any peacetime government anywhere anytime.

I wonder if the President would recognize those remarks after seeing what he has done in the past 4 years? I am going to give you the figures, if I have time later, about his enormous spending spree.

I am going to quote from what the President said on July 2, 1932:

> I propose to you, my friends, that government be made solvent and that an example be set by the President of the United States.

Is there any man in the House of Representatives or in this country who thinks the President has set an example on economy? If there is, let him speak now. Let me quote again from President Roosevelt's message to Congress on March 10, 1933:

> For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road toward bankruptcy. With the utmost seriousness I point out to the Congress the proven effect of this fact upon our national economy. Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on the rocks of loose financial policy. We must avoid this danger.

I wonder if the President ever gives any thought to these statements that he made 4 years ago?

I want to say again with reference to this man who is most responsible for this Government spending, that in Franklin D. Roosevelt's inaugural address, March 4, 1933, he said:

> Through this program of action we address ourselves to putting our national house in order and making the income balance the outgo.

When the President looks at the Treasury statement today the statement just referred to seems like a big joke.

Talk about economy; talk about Government expenses. I want to say this will be the most extravagant Congress that this Nation has ever seen before you get through with it. This Seventy-fifth Congress, before you get through with the appropriations, will be the most extravagant Congress in the history of the Nation. The Seventy-fourth was appalling in its expenditures and the Seventy-fifth will surpass it, I am afraid, even with the bonus left in the appropriation of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

I again quote from Franklin D. Roosevelt's Budget message of January 3, 1934:

> Furthermore, the Government, during the balance of this calendar year 1934, should plan to build its 1936 expenditures, including recovery and relief, within the revenues expected within the fiscal year 1936. We should plan to have a definite balanced Budget by the third year of recovery, and from that time on seek a continued reduction of the national debt.

I want to say to Mr. Roosevelt, in reference to those remarks, that should happen this year, but Mr. Roosevelt's Budget will be so unbalanced at the end of this year that it will be worse than any year in the history of Mr. Roosevelt's presidency up to this time. He just does not know what it is all about, and the public must advise him, because Congress does not seem to be able to. Congress is on a sit-down strike when it comes to economy in Government.

I do not want to condemn Mr. Roosevelt. I have not any desire to do so. He never did anything detrimental to me personally. I do not want to do anything detrimental to him personally, but I want him to assume the responsibility that is his. I would not do anything detrimental to him, but I want him, as Chief Executive, to come here and whip this Congress into line in economy in Government expenses, in consolidation of offices, which he promised the American people he would do. I want him to tell you to keep down these expenditures if you are going to keep this Government from being wrecked. Why is he so quiet on economy in Government, why the change in his attitude? He never has explained to the people.

I will read one more quotation from Mr. Roosevelt's address on November 4, 1932, in Brooklyn:

> The people of America demand a reduction of Federal expenditures. It can be accomplished not only by reducing the expenditures of existing department but it can be done by abolishing many useless commissions, bureaus, and functions, and it can be done by consolidating many activities of the Government.

Mr. Roosevelt had the power in his hands to reduce and consolidate these Government bureaus and commissions, but he did not do it; instead, he has established more bureaus than any three Presidents in the history of this Nation. No President has ever been so ruthless in the establishment of new bureaus and new organizations as the present President, although he condemned that very thing in the past administrations. Oh, it is easy to criticize; but it takes will power to carry out a principle that is worth while.

I want to show you what we are doing in our spending. In 1932 the Government spent $5,153,000,000. Then on June 30, 1934, the first full year of President Roosevelt's administration, we increased the expenditures over 1932 by 38 percent, or $7,105,000,000. At the end of 1935 we increased the expenditures over 1932 by 43 percent, or $7,375,000,000. At the end of 1936 Mr. Roosevelt increased the expenditures of this Government over 1932 over 72 percent. That is, over 1932, the very year he was condemning his predecessor in office, or $8,879,000,000.

Let me say to you Members of Congress, before you get through 1937 you will have spent more money than you did in 1936, and unless you change the course you are on now you will spend more money in 1938 than you did in 1937, because you are drafting that legislation right here in the House of Representatives at this time.

Do you propose to do it? Mr. Speaker, Mr. Majority Leader, Mr. Chairman of Appropriations, Mr. Chairman of Ways and Means, and other important committee chairmen, I advise you to go with caution. Stop, look, and listen.

Now, if you cannot understand what these annual figures mean, I shall give them to you by monthly averages. We spent in 1934 an average per month of $553,000,000. In 1935 the average expenditure per month was over $546,000,000. The average expenditures per month in 1936 were over $552,000,000; and the average per month expenditure in 1937 will be over $593,000,000. These are staggering sums, too staggering for the ordinary mind to realize. Do you Members of Congress understand them? From time to time I have given you Treasury statements. I now come to the Treasury statements for the month of February, and I hope you may understand and grasp the significance of the figures I am about to quote you. If the people responsible cannot understand the picture when it is presented one way, the next step to take is to present it to them in another way. You have not heard the President of the United States say that we are going to try to collect the debts owed us by foreign countries, amounting to over $22,000,000,000. Nor Congress has not insisted they pay their debts. Why not? You seem to have forgotten that item of national moment. You are now negotiating reciprocal-trade agreements by proxy to the President and Secretary of State, and the foreign countries are getting the advantage of this Government when it comes to closing up those agreements. Instead of improving our financial condition, we shall wake up some day to find that we are still further in the red. The foreign countries will get the advantage of America, and they are doing it. Protect American agriculture and American labor from cheap foreign-made goods.

I call your attention to the Federal Treasury statement of February 1, when the Federal Government was $4,851,000 in the red. That is, our receipts were less than our expenditures by these amounts. The Treasury statement of February 2 shows that the Federal Government was $8,735,000 in the red for that day. The Treasury statement for February 3 shows the Federal Government lost $12,263,000. The Treasury statement for February 4 shows that we were in the red $8,782,000. We see by the daily statement of February 5 that the Federal Government was in the red $12,590,000. Each day we spend more than we receive. How long can we keep it up?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. The Treasury statement for February 6 shows the Federal Government $7,248,000 in the red. On February 8 the Federal Government was in the red $14,779,000. On February 9 the Federal Government was in the red $8,649,000. On February 10 the Federal Government was in the red $2,716,000. On February 11 the Federal Government was in the red $7,562,000. On February 13 the Federal Government was in the red $4,808,000.

At no time to date in February do you find a day when the Federal Treasury was collecting more money than it spent. On February 15 they were in the red $17,000,000. And so it goes practically every day, you will find we spend more than we receive; this may be uninteresting, but, I ask you, Where are you going to get the money?

When I came to read the statements for March I felt that around the middle of the month, when the income-tax collections came in, that surely we would find days where the income exceeded the outgo, when we were collecting more money than we were spending; but when I looked at the statement of March 16, yesterday, and found that we were in the red $52,768,000 for that day I almost fell through the floor of my office. It is the most serious thing that we Members of Congress have to face, these enormous expenditures of the Government and the rate at which we are unbalancing our Budget; but my time is up and I have confined my remarks on this occasion to spending less. At some future time I hope to have an opportunity to show you that we must lay more taxes if we do not cut down the expenditures; but we must cut down the expenditures first. I will do my duty. Will you assume your responsibility? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, some of my good friends in Congress, representing great dairying States, are very much concerned about what we are doing and just what we will do about going into the dairying business in the South. I mean on a scale that they believe would be injurious to these States that are now shipping into South Carolina and other cotton States. My good friend ANDRESEN, representing the State of Minnesota, takes up quite a lot of the time of the Agricultural Committee when we are considering farm legislation in trying to find out if, for instance, under the Soil Conservation Act whether or not this program tends to increase dairying in the South. My good friend, BOILEAU, representing the State of Wisconsin, a real daring State, and also a member of the Agricultural Committee, apparently is not worried about what we are doing or what we will do along this line, stating that it just cannot be done in the South to the extent that it would be harmful to the dairy interest of the great dairying States of the Union. May I state that the only farm product that we cannot produce in the South is coffee. However, our people want to produce cotton and will continue to make cotton their major crop if only they are able to get a fair price for their cotton. During the past 16 years during my service in Congress, I have tried to get over to my good friends representing those States where their main crops are hogs, corn, wheat, and dairying, that they should join with us of the cotton States in our every effort in making the cotton farmers prosperous, for the reason it would enable our people to continue to stick to their cotton production and continue to buy from these other sections. We of the South have all along proven to be large buyers of those farm products grown in the West and Northwest—flour, meal and grits, hog products, butter and can milk, as well as horses and mules.

However, I want you to get this: Do not think for a moment that we cannot succeed in growing all of these products, including mules and horses. I have grown 35 bushels of wheat per acre on my farm. We have at this time in South Carolina some of the finest dairy herds to be found in any State. What about hogs? Listen to a few recent reports of shipments of hogs in South Carolina: Mr. Craven, county agent, Bamberg County, reports during January and February farmers shipped $53,233 worth of hogs. Mr. Massey, county agent, my home county, Orangeburg, states that four cars of hogs are being shipped today, and several more cars will be shipped in the next few days; Chesterfield County, March 15, the first carload of hogs ever to be shipped out of this county was shipped today to Richmond, Va. Kingstree, Williamsburg County, March 15, shipped the largest car of hogs today ever shipped by farmers from this county. Plans are to continue to ship each Monday. The papers of the various counties are carrying such information, which would indicate to you that our people can grow their hog products and to the extent of shipping to markets other than in South Carolina. This is also true with other cotton-producing States.

Without giving actual figures as to dairying and hog farming in my State, I am hoping that from what I have said on this subject I have made it clear that we can produce and compete with you along this line, especially to take care of the actual needs of the cotton States.

What I want to especially call to the attention of my friends and colleagues representing the West and Northwest is that you are only adding fuel to the fire when your State legislatures proceed to pass legislation denying any of the farm products of the South to be shipped into your States.

You remember two of us can play this game and, may I state, that this attitude on the part of your State to do this will tend to do two things: It will bring about the passage in the cotton States of legislation along the same line, and certainly it will cause our people to produce not only for the needs of the people of the South, but we can increase our shipments outside of the cotton States which will certainly interfere with your shipments to these outside markets where you now have no competition from the cotton States.

Let us see what sort of bill is now being considered before the Iowa General Assembly. I am quoting:

> Lard substitute shall mean any manufactured product containing not less than 90 percent animal fat by weight used as or in place of lard or corn oil except butter substitutes, which are now taxed.

I am quoting from the bill:

> There is hereby imposed * * * an inspection fee and excise tax of 5 cents upon each pound of any substitute for lard sold * * * or exposed for sale or given or delivered to a consumer, said fee to be paid to the secretary of agriculture prior to any such sale, gift, or delivery * * *.

The purpose of this bill, in fact, the purpose of all these bills would be to put such a high tax on cottonseed-oil shortenings that they would be driven out of the Iowa market and thereby force the people of Iowa and other States passing such legislation to use hog lard. As stated, I want to warn you, my good friends who so ably represent the great State of Iowa, as well as those representing other States, where the general assembly would be so short-sighted as to do such a foolish thing, that is, pass such legislation, that you should inform yourselves as to the large open and free market that you now have in the cotton States. May I state to you that the balance in trade in farm products between the Corn Belt and the dairying States, and that of the cotton South is overwhelmingly in favor of the Corn Belt and the dairying States?

Crisco and compound lard are made out of cottonseed oil, the purest of any and all types of shortenings. Millions of people today are using these products, including margarine, for the reason they are made out of pure vegetable oils, and for the further reason they are cheaper than hog lard and butter.

Why should either the Federal or a State Government tell any citizen what he should use as a table spread or a shortening? Taxing a legitimate product in order to increase the consumption of another is just one way of trying to dictate to consumers.

A tax on margarine is a tax on cottonseed, soybeans, and other crops, and a tax on beef cattle, sheep, and hogs.

I find that the old lobby representing selfish interests is working again, urging Congress and State legislatures to pass laws that will put an additional tax of from 5 to 20 cents a pound on shortenings other than hog lard and on margarine.

These are not bills for the purpose of raising revenue.

They are bills backed by the creamery interests and other State groups who, frankly, would like to see shortenings made out of vegetable oil and margarine taxed out of existence in order to increase the sale and price of butter and hog lard.

What is wrong with margarine?

Why should this food product be singled out for ruinous taxation?

I will give you the answer in a nutshell: Margarine's only crime is its great economy.

It sells for substantially less than butter.

I protest against this proposed taxation on the grounds it would be un-American and unfair.

Margarine is made from nutritious domestic vegetable fats that are produced from the crops of southern plantations.

It is a wholesome, economical food product that needs no defense.

It is used through preference, or necessity, in millions of American homes in both cities and on the farms.

It makes a delicious spread for bread.

Margarine is on my own table daily, therefore, I know what I am talking about. Thousands of people have been advised by their physicians to use margarine instead of butter.

Its food-energy content is measured at 3,400 calories to the pound, exactly the same caloric value as butter.

To tax wholesome margarine as a means of increasing the sale of butter would be as illogical as taxing apples to increase the sale of oranges; as taxing cotton to increase the use of wool.

And let me point out, the real burden of this tax would be borne by the people who can least afford to have their cost of living increased, the wage earners of America.

Finally, a tax of this character would result in depriving many persons in the low-income class of a wholesome and palatable spread for their bread.

This is another reason why I am for the President's Federal court program. During the 12 years I served under a Republican administration those of us interested in the under dog could not pass helpful legislation and if we did succeed in passing anything in the interest of farmers it was vetoed. Now, when we have a man in the White House interested in farmers, wage earners, and the masses of the people, and who has advocated the passing of legislation to help protect the great masses from the ravages of the selfish interests, the Supreme Court says, "You cannot do it."

Now comes this same selfish interest trying to put through legislation that would heap up an additional tax burden on that great class of people who are forced to buy cheaper shortenings and margarine so as to come within their ability to buy and so as to enjoy some type of spread on their bread.

I want my people in South Carolina and the people of the Cotton States to know just what is going on in the Corn Belt, the dairy States, as well as in Congress, so that they may be able to take same up with their Representatives in Congress, urging them to demand equal rights and fair play with every other section of our great country in the consideration of any legislation considered in the States as well as in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FORD].

ADEQUATE FEDERAL PENSIONS FOR THOSE ABOVE THE AGE OF 60 YEARS

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the Members of the House of Representatives who are interested in old-age-pension legislation will recall the speeches I made 2 years ago, in which I predicted that under the Social Security Act then being proposed, and which was later adopted, many of the deserving old people in a number of the States would be left without assistance. This prediction was based on my knowledge of what would necessarily result from requiring the States to match Federal contributions dollar for dollar. I am sorry to report to you that my prediction, although disregarded when the legislation was being enacted, has proven true. I feel now as I felt on April 12, 1935, when I told you—

> I cannot agree that the several States should be required to match dollar for dollar with any funds furnished by the Federal Government for payment of old-age pension benefits. Many States are absolutely unable to furnish any funds at all for this purpose, thus preventing any aged, needy citizens from receiving help in those States, while citizens of other States are being granted assistance. It is my contention that the Federal Government should set a definite sum per person to be granted each State for all persons in that State above a certain age. If the State is able to furnish additional funds, it should be allowed to do so. If the Federal Government agrees to furnish a certain sum per month for every person over a certain age, then let it furnish that sum, without requiring that the State furnish an equal sum per person.

This statement is an assertion of my principles regarding old-age assistance, and I am glad to urge the enactment of those principles into the living law of the land for the benefit of the aged.

An amendment in line with this feeling was offered by me on April 18, 1935, and was rejected by the House because it apparently did not want the Federal Government to be guaranteeing a certain sum regardless of the amount the States were able to furnish as supplementary funds.

What do we see today as a result of the rejection of the amendment which I offered? According to the figures which I have before me and which were compiled by the Social Security Board, in the month of December 1936 the average amount given the recipient of old-age assistance in Mississippi was $3.92. Why is the sum so low? Because Mississippi is unable to match to a greater amount the funds which could be obtained from the Federal Government. Nine other States were paying less than $15 a month, which means that those States were able to put up less than $7.50 as their portion of the amount payable under the Social Security Act.

A number of the Members have introduced good bills at this session and if enacted into law would mean that the Federal Government would pay a pension to every person over the age of 60 years, regardless of what any State could or could not pay.

The matter is up to the Members of Congress. If we are to do equal justice to all of the people over 60 years of age, we must amend the present law so that the aged in the poor States will be put on an equality with those living in the rich States. The eyes of our older citizens are turned toward Washington prayerfully looking for relief that can only come as a result of affirmative action by Congress. We have started in the right direction, but we must finish right by giving a guaranteed Federal old-age pension of not less than $15 a month to all persons who can satisfactorily prove that they are above the age of 60. I repeat that it is up to us, and I plead with you to join with me and other interested Members in taking effective action at once to secure the necessary legislation along the lines I have indicated. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in coming before the House at this time—and if possible I shall use less than the 20 minutes—is to present to the attention of the Members the situation with respect to the fisheries industry in the United States. I appeared before the Committee on Appropriations asking certain amendments, and I wish to congratulate the committee upon its interest in the fisheries. While I feel that they have not gone as far as they should, or as far as I should like to have them go, they have certainly manifested an interest in this industry which is so sorely distressed.

But there are some material facts that ought to be considered by the Committee as a whole, and there will probably be some amendments I shall offer for the consideration of the Committee.

The commercial-fishery industry is in as great, if not greater, need of aid as agriculture. It is made up of individuals widely scattered, unorganized, and dependent upon the Government for guidance and assistance.

The fishery harvest is marketed fresh, frozen, dried, pickled, salted, smoked, canned, and in the form of by-products. About one-third, or a billion pounds, is marketed fresh or frozen and about two-thirds in other forms. When ready for market in the various forms, those commodities are worth annually about $250,000,000 to the wholesalers or manufacturers. By the time they are purchased by consumers, the value, largely because of waste and transportation charges, may be doubled or more. The investment in vessels, gear, shore property, and other equipment is close to $250,000,000, while the operating capital undoubtedly is around $150,000,000. This makes the fishing industry worth nearly $1,000,000,000 to the economic structure of the Nation. This industry is based on a great natural resource, and one which under a wise plan of conservation and husbandry has promise of yielding a sustained production for future generations.

On an average, the annual harvest of our commercial fisheries amounts to nearly 3,000,000,000 pounds of protein food and edible oils, and about one-half a billion pounds of products are used in the arts and industries. In 1929, the volume of the edible fishery products was a little less than one-third the annual production of pork in this country, about one-third that of beef, about three times that of veal, and about four times that of mutton and lamb.

The harvest is made up of about 160 varieties or species, although 12 of these varieties make up over 80 percent of the total volume. These are salmon, pilchard, haddock, sea herring, cod, tuna and tunalike fishes, shrimp, oysters, crabs, flounders, mackerel, and halibut.

The catch as landed decreased in value from $124,000,000 in 1929 to $77,000,000 in 1931.

I call particular attention to this, because if there is anybody in the United States who may occupy the status of the forgotten man, it is the fisherman.

The average earning of a fisherman in 1929 was about $1,000. In 1931 this was reduced to about $630. On the basis of returns for 1932 and 1933, the average earnings per fisherman will be still less than in 1931. When economic conditions within the fishing industry become unbalanced, as they are at present, they are felt in every corner of the entire country, not only by the industry itself but by many others which depend upon it for a livelihood in whole or in part.

The canning of fish depends on other industries for its supplies and furnishes them markets for their goods. Statistics are lacking to show the entire picture. New agents are needed to make annual statistical canvasses of the fisheries of the United States. At present some sections are canvassed only on a biennial basis. In New England a statistical canvass was made for 1933 and the next for 1935. In the South Atlantic the Bureau canvassed the fisheries for the year 1934 and are now making a canvass for 1936.

These statistics should be obtained annually and should cover the catch of fish, the value of the catch, the methods of capture, the number of fishermen employed, the number of persons employed in fishery manufacturing plants, the output of manufacturing plants, and the wages and salaries paid to the employees in manufacturing plants. This information is of value to determine the relative abundance of the fish population and for economic purposes, in that the figures can be used by the industry in conducting business operations.

These statistics should cover prices paid fishermen, cost of marketing prices to consumers, marketing data, and other needed information to secure a better price to the fishermen themselves.

The true picture can never be obtained by present methods. It is necessary to collect data on an annual basis, for the year missed may be either a good year or a poor year, and if so, a basis is not obtained for accurate conclusions.

AID GRANTED IN OTHER COUNTRIES TO THEIR FISHERMEN

In England there is a herring board to promote the orderly marketing of herring.

Norway aids its canned-sardine packers in securing export markets for their products.

Germany has a fleet of mobile kitchens mounted on motor trucks with which cookery demonstrations are held throughout the country.

Russia conducts economic fishery research in all of its phases.

Italy studies organizations for trading in fish.

Japan carries on extensive studies of the production, processing, and merchandising of fish.

There was submitted to the Senate in 1936 a report prepared by the United States Tariff Commission covering the subject of subsidies and bounties to fisheries enterprises by foreign governments. It is known as No. 116, Second Series. I commend its study to all who are interested in this subject or who fail to realize the need for the United States to do more in aid of its fisheries and to adopt some definite, well-planned policy. The study is comprehensive, and I shall undertake here only a brief summary of its findings.

This report shows that in all foreign countries the recipients of the various kinds of direct assistance are almost exclusively individual fishermen or fishermen's organizations.

In Japan direct assistance is practically confined to fishermen's associations or to owners of vessels.

Fishing bounties, in contrast to bounties on exports, are paid on various bases in different countries. Governmental grants for vessel construction, for the repair of old vessels, for the erection of freezing establishments, and for fish-meal manufacture represent a certain percentage of the expense involved in these undertakings. In other words, the government pays part of the cost. According to available information, these grants usually range from 15 to 75 percent of expenses. The grants are more flexible in Japan, where in certain cases they may cover total costs. The grant is usually paid in a lump sum, provided the prerequisites are complied with; in other cases the payment is spread over a number of years.

Fishery bounties are paid by the government in Canada, Germany, and Japan.

A bounty on exports is paid in four countries—namely, France, the Irish Free State, Italy, and Newfoundland.

Governmental aid is granted for the construction of new fishing vessels in Germany, Japan, and Newfoundland. Cold-storage facilities are subsidized in Canada, Japan, and Norway. In Japan, miscellaneous direct aid consists largely of grants to various activities if undertaken by fishermen's cooperatives.

Loans to fishermen from public funds are made in Canada, France, Germany, Iceland, the Irish Free State, Italy, the Netherlands, Newfoundland, Norway, Portugal, and the United Kingdom. Furthermore, in Canada, Norway, and the United Kingdom the Government guarantees the funds obtained from private sources by the lending governmental agency for the purpose of refunding them to fishermen.

In Denmark the Government assists the fishermen in obtaining loans from private sources and guarantees the loan.

Activities designed to stimulate the home market for fish products are carried on by governmental agencies with public funds in Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, and Japan.

In Canada, France, and Japan methods of preparation are demonstrated and exhibits are held in order to promote the domestic consumption of fishery products; in Denmark and Japan advertising and other means of publicity are used.

Fishermen or fishery products enjoy the benefit of reduced rates of transportation in Canada, Germany, and Newfoundland. In Canada and Germany the preferential rates apply to fishery products; in Newfoundland to fishermen.

In Canada preferential transportation is extended in the form of certain fish-collection services carried on entirely at Government expense; in Germany the preferential rates on fish are from 20 to 45 percent below the regular freight rates. In Newfoundland fishermen traveling to fishing operations are granted reductions ranging from 50 to 86 percent of the regular passenger rates.

Exemptions of fisheries from certain duties or taxes exist in 6 of the 15 foreign countries investigated—namely, Canada, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Newfoundland, and the United Kingdom.

In Canada fishery products and materials used in fisheries are exempt from the general sales tax, and a number of imported commodities used in fisheries are afforded preferential duties. In Italy fishing vessels are exempt from taxation, and fishing establishments from certain taxes.

In Japan there is exemption from duty on imported mineral oil if used in fisheries operations.

In Mexico fishery vessels are exempt from vessel dues. Imports of ice to be used in fisheries enter duty free.

In Canada and Newfoundland a number of commodities used in fisheries enter duty free. In the United Kingdom the duty on imported hydrocarbon oils is remitted in full if the oils are used in fishery vessels.

There are other aids and benefits too numerous to be specified here, but it may be said that miscellaneous indirect bounties and subsidies exist in Italy, Japan, Mexico, Newfoundland, and Norway. In Italy such aid consists of prize contests held in connection with fisheries activities; in Japan it is represented by inspection of exports carried on entirely by the Government and by regional assistance; in Mexico it is extended in the form of occasional grants to cooperatives.

Governmental aid designed to improve conditions in fisheries is known to have been given in 14 of the foreign countries studied. Facilitation services consisted chiefly of, first, research and investigations; second, fish propagation and conservation; third, provisions for port facilities; and, fourth, other services.

Research investigations are probably carried on in every fish-producing country. Fish propagation and conservation are known to exist in Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, the Irish Free State, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway, and the United Kingdom.

Most, if not all, of the countries studied provide for port facilities for fisheries enterprises. Other types of facilitation are found in Canada, Denmark, Germany, the Irish Free State, Japan, Mexico, the Netherlands, Norway, and Portugal. They vary from compulsory cartel schemes in Germany and Portugal to technical education given to fishermen in Canada and Denmark. In a number of countries this type of aid is extended through cooperative bodies of fishermen.

The bulk of the governmental aid is granted in the form of indirect bounties and subsidies, such as government loans or guaranties of loans to fishermen or fisheries enterprises, and especially in the form of other governmental aid; that is, expenditures for facilitation services, such as research, fish propagation and protection, and for carrying on the administrative functions of fisheries bureaus or departments.

A few years ago, I think it was in 1934, there was passed by this House a bill to provide for a research vessel. It was not stipulated it was to be used in either the Atlantic or Pacific, but it could be used wherever needed. A very comprehensive report was filed by the committee. It was deemed by the committee to be of the utmost importance that there should be a research vessel that should study the condition of the fisheries in the ocean. That bill was approved by the President. No appropriations whatsoever have been made.

One of the amendments which I propose to offer is an amendment to start that fishery research vessel. The information that was submitted to this House at the time that bill was passed was that there were such research vessels in every fishing nation in the world. These other nations are studying their fishery problems. Mr. Chairman, we are going to be confronted at no late date, in my opinion, with the necessity of an international conference dealing with the fisheries of the world. The reason I say that is because today the economic method of converting the fisheries seems to be that which obtains in the Pacific Ocean; that is, the sending out of cannery vessels with the conversion plants on board. They have a mother vessel or manufacturing vessel, and it is accompanied by many supply boats which go out and catch the fish. The fish are brought on board and converted into oil or meal or canned or otherwise processed.

Last year a very serious question was raised as to the depletion of the pilchard industry of the Pacific Ocean. The salmon industry is similarly affected. On the Atlantic coast an increasing number of trawlers are sweeping the seas. When we enter into an international conference, as we may sooner or later, and begin a discussion of the fisheries of the world, we need to have definite, scientific information with which our delegates to that convention may be armed for the protection of our own country. In addition we need the information for our own guidance and the protection of our own waters.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BACON. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is saying and am in entire accord with the purpose of his remarks, but I do not want this committee left with the impression it is the fault of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLAND. Not at all. I am not making that charge.

Mr. BACON. It is not the fault of the Appropriations Committee the appropriation has not been made.

Mr. BLAND. If there is anything in the remarks I have made which seems to reflect on the committee in that respect, I wish it to be distinctly understood I am not criticizing that committee. I prefaced my remarks with the statement this committee had been generous. I believe that if an estimate had come up from the Bureau of the Budget for this item it would have received the favorable consideration of this committee. The committee is not at fault.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. In reference to the research vessel on the Atlantic coast, the chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, of course, remembers that we passed a similar bill for the Pacific coast, and it was vetoed by the President. In the veto message the President stated a cutter or some naval vessel could be converted into such a ship. Does the chairman believe that is practical?

Mr. BLAND. That matter was gone into by the committee at the time the study was made of the first vessel. The bill was reported out and passed. The information presented to the committee at that time, was it required a special type of vessel in order to make the studies that were needed and that there were no such vessels available.

This was the study made at that time.

There is another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the committee. I have referred here to the need of statistics. In the last Congress we passed a bill, the number of which I have forgotten, which met with a Presidential veto. The veto was based largely upon the fact we had made provision for fish in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill, and, besides, there was no need for legislative authority.

I am not criticizing the veto. While it did say aid was being provided in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill, upon a subsequent investigation it was discovered the only provision which was made with respect to fish in that appropriation bill was to secure information as to the quantity of frozen fish on the market. These statistics are being obtained, are being given to the Bureau of Fisheries, and are being distributed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. But that is an infinitesimal part of the information needed. The bill provided for other things. It provided for a statistical study of the fisheries throughout the United States, and made provision so that those figures could be secured annually.

The bill also provided an extension service similar to that which is being granted for agriculture. This information should be secured and sent out to the fishermen.

We reported out of this committee a few years ago a bill for the organization of cooperatives. Some fishermen have taken advantage of this legislation, but they are disorganized, they are not united. They need instruction, advice, and assistance. It is an obligation of the Federal Government to teach these people the advantages of cooperative associations. The Government did that for farmers and it should do as much for fishermen.

We also provided an extension service which would carry to the fisherman the news as to markets in the United States, so that from the information given out daily he would know what market was glutted, where a famine existed, and so determine the market to which he could best ship his fish with reasonable prospect of a fair price. This service would advise as to prices in the different markets. This information should be sent to different centers of production throughout the United States.

The fisherman, in whom I am satisfied you are interested, and in whom I am interested, is the man who goes out and catches the fish, the man who has fish to sell which he has himself caught. We are interested in all other problems of the fisheries, but primarily the fisherman who, above all, needs protection. We desire the information to go to him as to the prices at consuming centers so that he may not be at the mercy of those who purchase his fish when he has no information by which he can determine whether the price offered him is a fair price or is too low.

Very recently, in the section of the country from which I come, I noticed that some of the fishermen declined to go out for the catch of shad because the price was so low. Such a service as this would have been of immeasurable benefit to these people in showing them what the conditions were at all consuming centers of the United States.

At the appropriate time I shall offer amendments to this bill, but my purpose now is to bring this matter before you. We have started a fight in the committee of which I am chairman, and we do not propose to give it up until we have been able to secure for the fishermen of this country the benefits to which he is entitled and which are no more than have been accorded farmers and other classes of industry. He has been unable to get far because of his lack of organization, but he is learning to organize. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, on Friday the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], in referring to the situation in Detroit, referred to the situation in Anderson, Ind., with, as I understood it, the statement the Governor of Indiana called out the troops for the sit-down strike.

The situation in the matter of the sit-down strike at Anderson did not occasion the calling out of the troops. So far as the sit-down strike at Anderson was concerned, it was handled by the local courts, because we in Indiana believe in handling our own troubles locally.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. In a moment when I finish.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; but the other day when the gentleman said "in a moment", the gentleman did not yield. Is the gentleman going to yield in a moment?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The facts are these——

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GRISWOLD. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman, and I resent the interruption.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I apologize most humbly.

Mr. GRISWOLD. There was trouble there between a citizen and some people engaged in a labor dispute. At that time the National Guard was called, not because of the sit-down strike situation but because this citizen fired a shotgun into a group of some 19 other citizens of the State.

Thereafter certain people, whom we assume were citizens of Michigan, entered the State of Indiana from Michigan, 31 automobiles containing 149 people. They came down the national highway, insisting on going into Anderson, where these labor difficulties were going on. These people were met by the State highway police and some officers of the militia, the State National Guard, who refused to let them go on into Anderson. They were stopped at Alexandria, a few miles from Anderson, where they insisted on blocking traffic, conducting a sit-down strike on the highway.

The Governor of the State of Indiana advised the officers of the Guard and the highway patrol to send them back. These people said they did not have gasoline to take them back, and therefore they were conducting a sit-down strike there. The Governor of Indiana, through the officers of the State National Guard, informed them that Indiana took care of all its destitute and that it had money to take care of the destitute of other States long enough to get them out. The automobiles were then run into a filling station at Alexandria, the gasoline tanks filled with 155 gallons of gasoline at a cost of $31 to the State of Indiana, and the people were sent back to Michigan.

I state this in order that the House may know the true facts with regard to the matter to which the gentleman from Michigan referred.

The Governor of Indiana acted with wisdom and dispatch. His action and his understanding of the problem prevented bloodshed in Madison County. He did not attempt to settle the property rights of the disputants. The State of Indiana has laws governing the possession of property and eviction therefrom, which laws are enforceable by the courts; and the Governor did not attempt to ursurp this right with military authority. Had the necessity arisen to use the guard to maintain peace and the authority of the courts I have no doubt but that Governor Townsend would have been equal to the occasion. He did not ask the Federal Government to send in assistance. It was not a Federal matter. Neither side had submitted its case to the Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act. It was entirely a local matter, and the people of Indiana believe in local self-government. When the State has troubles within its borders it has a Governor big enough to cope with its troubles. Michigan should handle her troubles without assistance from outside.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield now.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman claim I misstated anything the other day; and if so, what was it?

Mr. GRISWOLD. My understanding of the gentleman's statement is that the National Guard was called out because of the sit-down strike. So far as the sit-down strike in the lamp plant at Anderson is concerned, it was handled by the courts, and the courts are still handling it. I think some 20 or so citizens, I am not sure of the number, many were people from outside the State, have been indicted. They were put in jail. Some of them are now out on bond or, perhaps, all of them are out on bond, but the court is handling the local labor situation in the State of Indiana, protecting the property rights of Indiana citizens, and bloodshed has been prevented. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman say there was not martial law at Anderson?

Mr. GRISWOLD. No.

Mr. HOFFMAN. There was, was there not?

Mr. GRISWOLD. There was in the county.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will continue, Mr. Chairman. During the time of that disturbance there was martial law in Indiana, in that county, and the troops of Indiana met this motor cavalcade from Michigan, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD] has stated, and turned them back at the county line. The State bought gas and you sent them back from whence they came; that is, you sent back those who were not arrested for their attempt to wreck a restaurant at Anderson.

Nineteen of them, who had gone down prior to the trip of the main body, attempted to storm a restaurant. They were met by the owner and his shotgun and they were repulsed. Nineteen of them were arrested by the military authorities, thrown into jail, later indicted by an Indiana grand jury, and turned over to the civil authorities for prosecution, and they will be, if they have not been, prosecuted in the Indiana court.

The course of your Governor was in accord with law. His conduct upheld the law of your State. It protected the right of your citizens under the Constitution of the United States and of your State. His conduct was in every way commendable, as was the conduct of your local officers.

I do want to congratulate the gentleman who comes from a State where the Governor has courage enough and is honest enough to keep his oath of office, enforce the laws of the State, and to guarantee to the citizens of the State the rights given to them under the Constitution.

It is my firm belief that, had the Governor of Michigan acted as did the Governor of Indiana and the Governor of Connecticut, upheld the hands of the court and of the civil authorities, this epidemic of sit-down strikes would have been prevented and bloodshed would have been avoided.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Of those 19, as I recall, none was a resident of Indiana. Am I right about that?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I could not say.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And but few, if any, were citizens of Michigan, although they had gone through Flint—had staged a strike there.

The point I was trying to make the other day was that if our President, instead of remaining silent on this subject, would tell his hired man, Murphy, and this lady down here who is running, or pretending to run, the Labor Department, to tell these "sit-downers" to get out, or if they had told them that at Flint when they first came there, we would not have had this trouble; but when you have a situation such as we had last week in Michigan with the Governor of our State giving the strikers encouragement, you cannot expect to settle a strike.

Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. DINGELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The point I am trying to bring to the attention of the gentleman from Michigan is that so far as we are concerned in Indiana, and so far as the Governor of Indiana is concerned, we are not asking for any Federal assistance in labor disputes in Indiana.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is fine.

Mr. GRISWOLD. We will take care of them ourselves in Indiana and I am pleased that the gentleman congratulates my Governor on that.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Sure, I do, and again I want to congratulate the gentleman on the attitude of his Governor in upholding the right of the men to work, in protecting them against nonresident armed men who would have kidnaped their factories and deprived them of their jobs. I wish the President, as long as he was picking Governors, had picked one for Michigan with equal courage and respect for the law and the rights of our citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

THE ADMINISTRATION'S FISCAL POLICY

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have been wondering recently whether or not high officials in the administration have not got their wires crossed a little bit on financial matters. I recall a short time before Congress opened, the leaders of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate were sent for and interviewed at the White House, and following this interview the announcement was broadcast there would be no taxes during this session of Congress and no need for such taxes.

This announcement was made to the world, and a week ago today we were confronted with another announcement from an administration source that we must have more taxes at once in order to balance the Budget now. That "now", of course, Mr. Chairman, is getting to be quite a favorite word in the administration, but the definition of it is hard to understand. The Budget has been "balanced" in that same way for several years; in fact, almost since the beginning of the present administration, when in just a "very short time" the Budget was going to be balanced.

The Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Eccles, now comes out with the statement that we must balance the Budget in order to prevent inflation. I wonder how this is going to be done. No explanation has been given, unless it may be that certain taxes are going to be increased. I am in thorough accord for once with the position of the Democratic Party that we ought to balance the Budget, but I would like to see more action and less talk about it.

But I defy Mr. Eccles or any other advocate of making both sides of the ledger meet, to balance the Budget at the present level of expenditures without confiscating the property of the citizens of this country. Taxes have already reached almost the breaking point. Mr. Eccles' statement said there were certain sources of revenue that could be increased. If you increase the income tax and the estate tax, as he advocates, you will practically take over the property, since the present maximum rates of these levies are 79 percent and 70 percent, respectively. That is all right, if that is the way you want to do it.

When it is stated that we are going to balance the Budget very soon by taxation, how does that statement bear with the newspaper item I hold in my hand that today, and every day, we are spending, according to the official report, $7,935,006 more than our daily income. It is going to be a very difficult problem to balance the Budget when you are daily spending nearly $8,000,000 more than you receive. That is just a juggling of arithmetic that I did not learn in my early elementary education, and I do not think any Democratic official learned it either.

Why bluff the people with what you are going to do and cannot do. There is only one way of eventually balancing the Budget, and that is to reduce the items of expenditure. That can be done and that should be done, but for one I do not see any indication of the majority party or the administration endeavoring to do it. If they can fool the people that they are going to balance the Budget now, in view of the facts that are actually before the people, they have my best wishes in that effort.

I wonder whether Mr. Eccles was putting up a trial balloon on this question of balancing the Budget with new taxation. In view of the statement made officially last autumn that there would be no tax bill during this session of Congress, he now puts up a balloon advocating taxation. Which are we to believe? The statement of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee after a White House interview that there would be no new tax bill this year, or the statement of Mr. Eccles last week that we must have more taxes? It looks to me as though it is a come-and-go proposition—heads I win and tails you lose. In other words, a tax bill every day looms nearer.

Who are paying the taxes today? A man's name does not have to be on the income-tax list to have him pay taxes. The worst taxes that we have are the hidden ones. Let any man on a salary, a clerk in a store on an ordinary weekly pay, tell you what part is left at the end of the week from his household budget now, in comparison with what it was 2 years or 5 years ago, so far as the price of staples and necessities are concerned. There is the taxation. And the moment you try to raise your taxes today, it is the average man and the woman who will pay the bill, whether their name is on the income-tax roll or not. They not only pay taxes directly, but also in the increased cost of what they buy. It is a terrible situation that we face, and it is due in very large measure to the extravagance of the present administration. Let us put the blame where it belongs. Unless more economy is shown in the next 3 years than has been shown in the past, what do we face at the end of this administration?

There has been absolutely no economy so far, as is shown in the following table of expenditures under the present administration:

Federal expenditures, 1933–38

1933	$5,143,000,000
1934	7,105,000,000
1935	7,376,000,000
1936	8,880,000,000
1937 (Budget estimate)	[1] 8,481,000,000
1938 (Budget estimate)	[1] 7,695,000,000

[1] Does not include items not included in Budget.

I could go on indefinitely referring to the present financial condition of the country, but everyone is familiar with the situation. I am glad to find that even some of the officials of the Government are at last becoming "Budget conscious." The people long since have become "tax conscious", and if those in authority in the country today will become Budget conscious it may in the end result in a reduction of governmental expenditures in such a bill as we are considering here this afternoon.

I think in all fairness it can well be said that the members of the subcomittee that is handling this bill today, the able chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. MCMILLAN, and his associate on the minority side, Mr. BACON, are doing their utmost conscientiously to reduce the expenses of Government so far as this bill is concerned, and I wish the example that the gentleman from South Carolina is setting his party associates would be followed. Unfortunately it has not been. Instead of the Budget being balanced downward, as it should be, if it is balanced at all, it will have to be balanced upward by levying more and more taxes on the everyday men and women of the country. I, for one, believe in economy in government, and it is certainly time that that economy is not only preached but practiced by those in authority.

Mr. Chairman, in his radio "fireside chat" a short time ago the President said that he had a great ambition.

I, too, have a great ambition, Mr. Chairman. I want to live to see the day when the President carries out his solemn promise, made over 4 years ago and which he has since repeated many times, that he would balance the Budget—now. And when it is balanced I want to see it done, not by increasing taxes on the masses, who cannot afford to pay them, but by reducing expenditures through the elimination of waste and extravagance.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlewoman from Indiana [Mrs. JENCKES].

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to this House of Representatives and to the Congress to keep faith with American mothers, American parents, and American womanhood. I am appealing to this House of Representatives and the Congress to prevent heartaches of unnamed parents whose children will be kidnaped and murdered in days to come. I am making this appeal on behalf of the Department of Justice appropriation, particularly that appropriation dealing with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which is conducted under the most able and efficient direction of J. Edgar Hoover and his marvelous G-men and every member of the staff and every member of that great organization.

American women and especially mothers are demanding that this Congress give Attorney General Cummings and Mr. J. Edgar Hoover all the money and all of the men that they deem necessary in order to stamp out, for all times to come, kidnaping, white slavery, extortion, bank robbery, and other crimes, which have created so much suffering in recent years. If this House of Representatives refuses to appropriate the amount of money which Mr. J. Edgar Hoover originally requested and which he deems necessary and required for the efficient operation of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, then this House of Representatives and the Congress must stand responsible for any increase in kidnaping, white slavery, extortion, and other crimes.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation only has 630 G-men to cover the 48 States, serving 130,000,000 people. Just think of that, my dear colleagues. Over 7,000 unassigned cases are awaiting investigation on account of the lack of personnel. In the year 1936 the Federal Bureau of Investigation secured convictions in 94 percent of all the cases investigated. The Federal Bureau of Investigation saved the Government in fines over $7 for every dollar spent by the taxpayers in the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Federal Bureau of Investigation investigated over 80 kidnaping cases, and every one has been solved with the exception of the Mattson case at Tacoma, Wash., which I am sure will be solved if this Congress does not hamper the Federal Bureau of Investigation by refusing to give that most efficient organization the money which it requires.

J. Edgar Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation have requested, and need and must have, not less than $337,160 for additional field special agents. The special committee of this House of Representatives and the Budget committee refuse to allow this amount. This amount is needed for salaries and expenses. This Congress has appropriated billions of dollars, none of which is as important as the $337,160 which is needed for G-men to protect your homes and my home and the children of America from kidnaping and millions of young girls and women from the horrors of white slavery. Do we want the Nation to accuse this Congress of being penny-wise and pound-foolish? Let us give the Federal Bureau of Investigation this money and let them put on duty the G-men they think are necessary, not the number of men the Budget Bureau thinks are necessary.

After the famous Lindbergh kidnaping case Americans felt that kidnapers would never attempt their nefarious efforts again. We were mistaken. The heart-broken fathers and mothers, parents of kidnaped children, are mute testimony to this fact.

As a mother and as a Member of Congress, I appeal to you, my colleagues, to make available to Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the full amount of money he needs. I speak in the name of American womanhood, who are demanding that kidnaping and white slavery be stamped out. It will be stamped out if the Congress will furnish the financial support J. Edgar Hoover and his organization needs. But if this House of Representatives adopts a penny-wise and pound-foolish procedure, and skimps and curtails the funds of this most important Bureau in Federal service, we will be indirectly helping kidnapers and white slavers who fear the properly financed activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

I am sure that your constituents, parents, women, churches, women's organizations, and business organizations, will applaud and praise you if you will heed my plea and place back in the appropriation the full amount requested by Mr. Hoover.

This Congress has appropriated billions of dollars for many purposes, and I do not know of any purpose where a few hundred thousand dollars could be spent to a better advantage, which would provide more peace of mind to the parents and general citizenship, than by giving these few extra hundreds of thousands of dollars which Mr. J. Edgar Hoover has stated he needs and which the Budget officials have, in the name of economy, and which I brand as false economy, removed. Let us not break faith with the mothers and fathers of America. Kidnaping and white slavery must be abolished.

Your favorable vote today for the extra money needed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation will mark the first steps, and I appeal to you for your active interest and vigorous support. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, billions of dollars have been expended in recent years to bring about better conditions in the agricultural industry. Curiously enough, nothing has been done in behalf of the poultry raisers, whose plight has been just as serious as other branches of agriculture assisted, and who in numbers rank second. Indeed, it can be truthfully stated the poultry industry has actually been penalized by the legislation enacted and the efforts of the administration to aid other classes.

The men and women engaged in the poultry industry are sympathetic with the needs of the producers of corn and grains. It is realized if these growers are prosperous the entire country is benefited. They do maintain, however, that no administration has a right by legislation to bring ruin and disaster to one large group of our people in an effort to aid another group. By all means help the producer of grain, but not at the cost of ruin to the larger poultry group. Surely there must be some other way to aid the grain producers than that which has brought so much misery to the poultry industry in the last 2 years.

There is no dispute over the facts. A division of the Department of Agriculture said last November:

> The relation of chicken and egg prices to feed prices on November 15 this year (1936) is the most unfavorable to poultry producers since 1917.

That is the report from the Department of Agriculture, and one would think, knowing the acuteness of the situation, something definite would be done for the poultry industry.

Unfortunately there is only inactivity and sympathetic words, which fail to pay the feed bills. Think of it! The worst conditions since 1917, and nothing being done about it. No wonder the millions of poultry raisers are now adopting a more militant mood. They must be militant, otherwise they will continue to be the forgotten men and women engaged in agriculture.

The records of the average farmer confirm the report of the Federal bureau. A farmer in my district sends some interesting data. On April 4, 1936, he bought corn at $1.60 per 100 pounds, and he sold his eggs at 25 cents a dozen. On September 22, 1936, he paid $2.63 for his hundred pounds of corn and sold his eggs at 37 cents a dozen. On March 5, 1937, he was paying $2.37 for his corn, and large eggs brought 25 cents a dozen and medium eggs 21 cents.

To put it a little more concretely, he is now getting a little less for his eggs than he received a year ago and his grain costs are 40 percent higher.

Unless there is a radical change in conditions the second largest agricultural group has a long road to go before it is permitted to share in any prosperity that may be hereabouts.

The poultry raisers are fully aware what has brought about their financial woes. It is the administration policy which curtails the production of corn and grain, creating an artificial price for the grain and leaving the poultry producer to struggle along with the same price for his product.

And the pity of it all has been the high grain prices have gone chiefly to the Argentine producer. For months the American poultry producer has been obliged to pay tribute to the corn grower in the Argentine. Ruin for thousands of American farmers so that there may be a larger trade with a neighbor. If there is any sense in this it is so well concealed it is difficult to discern.

This is no new problem. It has frequently commanded the attention of other countries in the past. England has constantly grappled with it. From the time of the corn laws in England industrial nations have found it necessary to foster and protect their agriculture by such means as would not materially increase the cost of living of their industrial workers.

The producers of poultry, dairy products, and livestock understand there is a limit to which you can tax the consumer. Jack up the prices too high and you have less consumption, less work, and in the end disaster. The producer does not want to bring about this condition of affairs, but he has no alternative if his Government, by restrictive regulations, forces up his own costs.

Today high grain prices, with the need of importing feed grains from abroad, have created critical conditions among all livestock feeders. Dairymen, poultrymen, and hog raisers provide the three largest agricultural products of the country. Without ample feed grains at reasonable prices meat, milk, egg, and pork prices must rise rapidly if normal production is to continue.

Unless normal production is maintained, even higher prices will result before the damage to our livestock industry is repaired.

Industry cannot go forward safely with high food costs absorbing the workers' wages. Industry cannot afford to allow maladjustments in our agricultural enterprise to limit our increasing prosperity. The millions who are on the relief rolls are cruelly cut when the cost of living is so radically increased by the administration.

If we are to assume the burden of vast expenditures to safeguard our future food supply through Federal action, should we not insist that these sums be so administered as to protect the livestock feeders as well as the grain farmers? Must we not insist that Federal subsidies to agriculture insure an abundance of feed grains rather than a scarcity? Is it not a policy which will bring greater prosperity than the policy of restriction so fondly cherished by the Roosevelt administration?

The animal feeders of America—dairymen, poultrymen, and hog raisers—are today fighting the battle of the consumers for reasonable food prices. They seek the aid of the consumers in the determination of Government policies which shall be for the common good of all.

The cow, the sow, and the little red hen have been and still are the great food producers of the country.

Let us quite playing politics with the great agricultural industry. Let us forget dreams and get down to earth and solve this agriculture problem on merit and without favoritism. Sane spending of the billions given in recent years should have brought us nearer to a solution than we are. The American people are willing to maintain an agriculture industry on an American basis, but they do want more intelligence than when in aiding one person you cripple two. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I appreciate the courtesy that has been extended in granting me 15 minutes to discuss a subject close to my heart and one that I hope will be of interest to the Members of this House. I do not expect often to take up the time of the House, but during these hours of general debate, custom permits the discussion of subjects that may be of more immediate interest to the individual than the Members as a whole.

A Delegate representing a Territory in Congress has a qualified position as a Member of this House, with the specific obligation of speaking for his Territory when occasion requires and opportunity permits. It is, however, a well-established office having been created by Congress almost simultaneously with the birth of this Nation, and there has been in over 150 years of American history a continuous succession of Territorial Delegates from every one of the present-day States except the Thirteen Original Colonies, Vermont, and Texas. I accept the position with great pride despite its limitations and consider it an honor to be included in the roll of Delegates of this House and a high privilege to speak in that capacity for Hawaii as a Territory.

But because there is some confusion in the minds of the public at large and perhaps in that of some of the Members of this House regarding the status of Hawaii as a part of the United States of America, I feel it incumbent on me to place before you the historical background of Hawaii's becoming a part of this Nation and what I consider its proper place within the Union.

Because Hawaii is separated from the mainland, and because there are, with the exception of Alaska, no longer any Territories on the mainland, the position of a Territory has become somewhat ill-defined. There is a tendency to confuse it with possessions. It is so convenient to think of the noncontiguous Territories of the United States as insular possessions since so many of them are insular and only Hawaii among these island groups is an incorporated Territory. Without desiring in any way to detract from the position these other parts of the Nation have under the American flag, nor question their claims to recognition, I do want to make the point again that I made the other day, that Hawaii has a unique place in the Union, because it became a part of the United States by annexation.

For nearly three-quarters of a century America had taken a leading part in upholding the Hawaiian government against the turbulence of foreign residents, Americans and others, and the intrigues of local representatives of foreign nations. The birth of the Hawaiian nation followed closely after its discovery to the western world in 1778 by the English navigator Capt. James Cook. The consolidation of the different islands under one rule was accomplished by the great Hawaiian chief, Kamehameha, in the 1790's. For practically 100 years his descendants and an allied family ruled over Hawaii as a kingdom.

While the monarchy was trying desperately to maintain itself against the cupidity of the European nations, sometimes of their agents rather than of the governments themselves, it was America that consistently held out a supporting hand, that took a stand against foreign interference with the affairs of the country; that advised its rulers how to meet the recurring emergencies of French demands, of British arrogance, and of Russian efforts at infiltration. The arrival of the first group of American missionaries in 1820, followed by several later groups, comprised of devoted American men and women from practically every New England State and many of the Middle Atlantic States, set the character of Hawaiian civilization along American lines. Indeed, the cultural foundation of Hawaii today is New England, superimposed on the old Polynesian concepts of the ancient Hawaiians.

The rapid acceptance of Christianity by the Hawaiian people, the high degree of confidence in which the Hawaiian rulers held the early missionaries, gave the latter great power during the formative years of Hawaii's monarchical period. This thoroughly American element in Hawaii not only checkmated the smaller British colony and other foreign groups in their efforts to lead Hawaii away from America but also exercised a strong influence in the United States in favor of Hawaii.

Besides the missionaries themselves, there were other Americans settling in the islands engaged in business and trade. My own New England ancestor came to Hawaii in 1793, nearly 30 years before the missionaries, and was one of the first King's foreign advisers. Although these traders did not always see eye to eye with the missionaries in all things, their jealousy of any other foreign influence added that much more weight to the Americanization of Hawaii that was going on long before the United States had crossed the Mississippi River.

The American Navy was another powerful force to keep Hawaii out of the hands of other nations until the inevitable workings of destiny brought Hawaii under the American flag. Hawaiian history has on its honor roll the names of several famous naval commanders who came to Hawaii's rescue in the many crises that agitated its course as an independent nation. On one accasion, when a British naval officer had hauled down the Hawaiian flag and hoisted the British flag in its stead, and before his superior had arrived to repudiate his action and restore Hawaiian sovereignty, an American commodore—Kearney—protested vigorously, and received members of the Hawaiian royal family with full honors as evidence of his refusal to recognize the British rule. As early as 1826 the United States Navy, its officers then practically roving ambassadors of their country, were advising the native government, acting as referees in disputes involving foreigners and the government, supporting law and order against those who would have liked to leave the Ten Commandments behind them when they entered the Pacific Ocean. Capt. Thomas ap Catesby Jones and Captain Finch; Commodores Downes, Kennedy, Read, and Kearney, already mentioned; and Commodore Wilkes, whose exploring expedition added so much to the knowledge of the whole Pacific area, are great names in Hawaiian history, as they are honorable names in American history.

I paint this picture as the background of the steps that led up to our annexation; so that the last act was indeed, as President McKinley so truly said in his message to the Senate dated December 6, 1897, transmitting the treaty of annexation:

Under such circumstances, annexation is not a change; it is a consummation.

In addition to the close ties that bound us to America, first cultural and later economic as well, there were many political ties, treaties, and trade agreements, and abortive efforts at complete union of the two countries. As early as 1842, Daniel Webster, as Secretary of State, paved the way for the recognition of Hawaiian independence by declaring it to be—

The sense of the Government of the United States that the Government of the Sandwich Islands ought to be respected; that no power ought to take possession of the islands, either as a conquest or for the purpose of colonization; and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing Government or any exclusive privileges or preferences in matters of commerce.

The same sentiments were expressed in President Tyler's message to Congress of December 30, 1842, and in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations written by John Quincy Adams. This strong stand soon led England and France to jointly declare that they—

Taking into consideration the existence in the Sandwich Islands of a government capable of providing for the regularity of its relations with foreign nations, have thought it right to engage reciprocally to consider the Sandwich Islands as an independent state, and never to take possession, either directly or under the title of a protectorate, or under any other form, of any part of the territory of which they are composed.

The first formal efforts for annexation were made in 1854, when President Pierce instructed Secretary of State Marcy to commission Mr. D. L. Gregg to represent the United States in Hawaii to negotiate a treaty with Kamehameha III for that purpose.

This annexation treaty was to provide for the admission of Hawaii as a State—

Enjoying the same degree of sovereignty as other States and admitted as such * * * to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of a State, on a perfect equality with other States of the Union.

This proposed treaty was not ratified and the admission of Hawaii to the Union was not consummated at this time primarily because of the death of Kamehameha III and the fact that his successor, Kamehameha IV, was not interested in having Hawaii annexed to the United States and also because the representatives of Hawaii insisted upon being admitted as a State. The records show that efforts were made to persuade Hawaiian officials to accept Hawaii's admission to the Union as a Territory, which these officials, and especially King Kamehameha III refused to do. The Hawaiian authorities frankly stated that they looked forward to the time when their country might constitute an integral portion of the great North American Republic and were willing to cede to the United States—

All its territories, to be held by them in full sovereignty, subject to the same constitutional provisions as other States of the American Union.

But were unwilling to forego the—Rights and privileges of the citizens of the United States in terms of perfect equality in all respects with other American citizens.

As evidence of good faith on the part of the American Government, Secretary Marcy in the first of a series of United States pledges of good faith stated that—

It will be the object of the United States, if clothed with the sovereignty of that country (Hawaii), to promote its growth and prosperity.

Although the matter of annexation lay dormant for the time being, the general attitude of all American Secretaries of State following Secretary Marcy was that the United States had a special interest in Hawaii, and would not permit the Kingdom to go under the control of any other power. In the years following this first treaty the economic relations between the two countries became even closer, America coming to dominate Hawaii's commerce. As industries were developed in the islands the nearest and most logical market for its products was America and the converse was equally true that the source of supply for all the commodities it needed was also America. This led to the signing of a treaty of reciprocity in 1875, effective 1876, which made Hawaii practically a unit of the American economy. It may be of interest to the membership of the House to know that during the discussions that preceded the treaty, the King of Hawaii, Kalakaua, was the guest of Congress at a joint session of the House and Senate, and appeared here on this floor, and exchanged compliments with the Speaker, as recorded in the RECORD for the Forty-third Congress, second session, page 144.

Naturally the treaty gave the people of Hawaii a sense of security in their commerce with America, and brought about the further development of its principal industry, the sugar industry. It guaranteed to Hawaii an open market for its products and greatly increased Hawaii's demands for American goods.

In 1893 a local revolution overthrew the Hawaiian monarchy, which had existed for nearly 100 years, and set up a temporary government in its place. The principles of the new government were issued in a proclamation announcing the abrogation of the monarchy and the establishment of a provisional government to exist until terms of union with the United States of America had been negotiated and agreed upon. President Sanford B. Dole of the provisional government of Hawaii dispatched commissioners to Washington with instructions to negotiate a treaty with the United States Government "by the terms of which full and complete political union may be secured between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands."

President Harrison approved of the principles of annexation and designated Secretary of State John W. Foster to act on behalf of the United States in negotiating an annexation treaty. In the conferences held with Secretary Foster, the commissioners from Hawaii insisted that Hawaii be admitted to the Union as a State. Secretary Foster replied to their demands that "bringing Hawaii into the Union" was the main object in view, that while not averse to statehood, a treaty providing therefor would occasion debate and delay, and that Hawaii, by asking for annexation had demonstrated her confidence in the United States and could be assured that if annexed, that confidence would be justified. The Hawaiian commissioners were evidently convinced of the sincerity of Secretary Foster, because they made formal written request for "full and complete political union" of Hawaii with the United States "as a Territory of the United States." Upon receipt of this formal request, Secretary Foster suggested omitting the provision concerning territorial government on the ground that details involved therein might cause delay, and suggested in place thereof that the treaty contain a provision that Hawaii should "be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof." The Hawaiian commissioners were reluctant to accede to this change, but after consulting the Century Dictionary which defined "integral" and cited examples as follows, they accepted the modification:

"Integral"—relating to a whole composed of parts, spatially distinct (as a human body of head, trunk, and limbs) or of distinct units.

"Intrinsic"—belonging as a part to the whole, and not a mere appendage to it.

All the Teutonic states in Britain became first dependencies of the West Saxon King, then integral parts of the Kingdom.

This clarification of the definition of "integral" was considered extremely important by the Hawaiian commissioners, because they did not wish Hawaii to be considered a mere appendage or possession of the United States.

President Harrison was very much pleased with the treaty as drawn. In his message transmitting this treaty to the Senate on February 15, 1893, President Harrison said:

Only two courses are now open, one the establishment of a protectorate by the United States, and the other annexation full and complete. I think the latter course, which has been adopted in the treaty, will be highly promotive of the best interests of the Hawaiian people, and is the only one that will adequately secure the interests of the United States.

No action was taken on the treaty prior to the expiration of President Harrison's term on March 3, 1893. President Cleveland, his successor, declined to consider annexation, withdrew the treaty from the Senate, and made an unsuccessful attempt to restore the Hawaiian monarchy.

The provisional government of Hawaii immediately proceeded to transform itself into the Republic of Hawaii, and on July 4, 1894, formulated a constitution which was adopted by a constitutional convention. Article 33 of this constitution provided for the making of "a treaty of political or commercial union between the Republic of Hawaii and the United States * * *."

It was undoubtedly in the minds of the leaders of the Republic of Hawaii that, despite President Cleveland's opposition to annexation, the argument of events would sooner or later force the issue.

Almost immediately after the inauguration of President McKinley in 1897 a new annexation commission was accredited to Washington by the Republic of Hawaii. President McKinley designated Secretary of State John Sherman to represent the United States in the negotiations. In the conferences with Secretary Sherman the Hawaiian commissioners requested that annexation be expressed in terms of the Harrison treaty, namely, that they be annexed to the United States "as an integral part thereof." This request was agreed to by Secretary Sherman and a treaty was drafted with such provision.

In his message to the Senate, dated December 6, 1897, already referred to, President McKinley said that Hawaii was—

Realizing a purpose held by the Hawaiian people and proclaimed by successive Hawaiian governments through some 70 years of their virtual dependence upon the benevolent protection of the United States. Under such circumstances annexation is not a change; it is a consummation.

He further states that—

If the treaty is confirmed, as every consideration of dignity and honor requires, the wisdom of Congress will see to it that * * * the most just provisions for self-rule in local matters with the largest political liberties as an integral part of our Nation will be accorded the Hawaiians. No less is due to a people who * * * come of their free will to merge their destinies in our body politic.

In the meantime war with Spain was brewing. At the time the United States, as a young nation, was not known to the world in its full lusty strength. There were those who felt America had undertaken a difficult task. We of Hawaii felt no qualms, felt no fears. We were as wild with enthusiasm as any and greeted the transports and naval vessels en route to and from the Orient with every hospitality. Our government disregarded every tenet of international law in putting Hawaii, especially the port of Honolulu, at the disposal of the United States military forces, and laid itself open to any reprisals Spain might wish to make. Our people did this with their eyes open to the possible consequences, but we considered ourselves so much a part of America as to make the war as much our own as though we had by formal treaty allied ourselves with the United States. The Battle of Manila Bay made Hawaii essential to the United States, and today's defense plans make it even more imperative that Hawaii should be under the jurisdiction of the United States.

During these exciting days, which I spent in Honolulu as a boy helping to entertain the Volunteers as they came ashore off transports and to feed them something to vary the embalmed beef of transport fare, the treaty so strongly endorsed by President McKinley languished in the Senate. Annexation was finally consummated by joint resolution of Congress accepting, ratifying, and confirming the "cession" by the Hawaiian Government. This "cession" was the resolution of the Hawaiian Senate containing the full text of the treaty.

The treaty provides that "those islands shall be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof", and the ratification of such a treaty by the Hawaiian Senate, as required by the constitution of the Republic of Hawaii, is referred to in the joint resolution of annexation as the cession on the part of Hawaii upon which the joint resolution was based. The joint resolution, therefore, incorporates into itself the said basis of annexation as much as though the resolution itself had contained the above phrase.

On July 7, 1898, the resolution stating that "such cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed" was finally adopted. The formal transfer of the sovereignty of Hawaii was not effected, however, until August 12, 1898, when Harold M. Sewall, Minister of the United States to Hawaii, presented to President Dole a certified copy of the resolution, and the sovereignty and property of the Republic of Hawaii was transferred to the United States of America.

Mr. Sewall's instructions from Secretary of State W. P. Day, in a letter dated July 8, 1898, were in part as follows:

Herewith a copy of a joint resolution of Congress for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

By the preamble to this resolution it is recited that the Government of the Republic of Hawaii has in due form signified its consent in the manner provided by its constitution "to cede * * *."

These recitals, it will be observed, are made in the language of the treaty of annexation, concluded at Washington on the 16th day of June 1897. They, as well as the other terms of the treaty, were advisedly incorporated in the joint resolution, because they embody the terms of cession which have not only been agreed upon by the two Governments but which have also been ratified by the Government of the Republic of Hawaii. The joint resolution, therefore, accepts, ratifies, and confirms on the part of the United States the cession formally agreed to and approved by the Republic of Hawaii.

At the ceremony in Honolulu, when presenting the certified copy of the joint resolution of annexation to President Dole, Minister Sewall said:

This joint resolution ratifies and confirms the cession formally consented to and approved by the Republic of Hawaii.

President Dole, in reply, said:

A treaty of political union having been made, and the cession formally consented to by the Republic of Hawaii having been accepted by the United States of America, I now, in the interest of the Hawaiian body politic, and with full confidence in the honor, justice, and friendship of the American people, yield up to you as representative of the United States the sovereignty and public property of the Hawaiian Islands.

After the salute to the Hawaiian flag and its lowering, Mr. Sewall said:

Mr. President, in the name of the United States I accept the transfer of the sovereignty and property of the Hawaiian Government.

The American flag was then hoisted and saluted. The Minister then congratulated "his fellow countrymen" on the consummation of the national policies of the two countries. By act of April 30, 1900, Hawaii was organized into a Territory of the United States.

Congress followed a precedent in admitting Hawaii to the Union. The Republic of Texas was admitted to the Union as a State by joint resolution of Congress, it likewise being a free and sovereign nation at the time of annexation. It is undeniable that in annexing Hawaii by joint resolution the Congress did not have the power to alter the terms agreed upon in the preceding treaty of negotiations. The congressional joint resolution specifically "accepts, ratifies, and confirms on the part of the United States the cession formerly agreed to and approved by the Republic of Hawaii." If the nature of the agreement had been changed by the Congress, both parties would have had to signify their acceptance of the new conditions.

This is the story in brief of the American background of Hawaii for many years preceding annexation, of the successive steps that led to its annexation by joint resolution, and of its present status as an incorporated Territory of the United States, and an integral part of the Nation. I was present in the palace grounds when the Hawaiian flag was hauled down, never again to be the banner of an independent nation, but continued in use as our "state" flag. I saw the American flag hoisted in its stead, and sensed, even though but a boy, the feeling of pride, and relief, and security that that ceremony brought to our people. As a Territory we follow the precedents of American history. As a Territory we accept all the responsibilities and obligations of American citizenship, both individually and as a community. As a Territory we share with all other Americans the full benefits of American citizenship, of American economic and political institutions. As a Territory we accept no lesser place under the flag than even a sovereign State except in those specific limitations applicable to our political status. As a Territory we have fulfilled every possible test that can be applied to us. And, finally, as a Territory, we have the right by the fundamental principles of American democracy to aspire to statehood. [Applause.]

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, there are two important items in this appropriation bill that I desire to bring to the attention of the Committee. One of them pertains to aviation and the other to the training of apprentices.

Referring to aviation, that industry has come forcibly to public attention during the past year because of a few unfortunate mishaps. On the whole, I believe American aviation is by far the best and safest on earth, and that its trained personnel cannot be equaled in any other country interested in the promotion of aviation. But, as a result of these mishaps, congressional committees have been appointed to delve into the subject of air safety.

A committee headed by the senior Senator from New York [Senator COPELAND], known as the Copeland committee, has made its report. It is very interesting, and every Member of the House should read its suggestions. That committee proposes an authorization of $12,414,000 at once to advance aviation in America. It points out that this $12,000,000 plus is necessary. In its break-down of the figures it would spend $10,000,000 for new ground aids throughout the country, $2,364,000 for more adequate weather-investigation facilities, and $50,000 to study pilot fatigue, as a means to determining how many hours pilots should be kept on duty. All of these recommendations are noteworthy and meritorious.

The Air Transport Association of America recommends a sum approximating that recommended by the Copeland committee. I have a letter from the president of that association. In it he offers a list of improvements that are needed in my own State.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, I ask that this letter may be made a part of my own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter and list are as follows:

This list has been compiled from the experience of our member companies who are daily flying the airways to, from, and through your State. Naturally, the items in this list have been submitted to the appropriate Government departments, with the hope that some day Congress may make possible the installation of these aids. They are not only desirable from the viewpoint of peacetime flying but are also essential if, in case of emergency, we hope to avoid the possibility of our military air force being in the wrong place at a crucial moment, should atmospheric conditions be adverse.

STATE AND FACILITY NEEDED—NEW YORK

Albany: Light chains, beacon lights to Westport, relocate radio.
Brooks Grove: Radio, teletype.
Buffalo: Light chains, airplane meteorograph, relocate radio.
Columbiaville: Modernize radio.
Dunkirk: Modernize radio.
Elmira: Relocate radio, teletype.
Floyd Bennett: Light chains, radio.
New Hackensack: Improve radio.
Rochester: Radio.
Rouses Point: Beacon light, radio.
Utica: Teletype, radio.
Westport: Beacon light, radio.
White Plains: Radio marker.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Commerce has made recommendations to the Appropriations Committee, and the committee in the main has agreed to those recommendations. The Commerce Department requests flexibility in the expending of the appropriations. I understand there is such flexibility within the bureaus, up to 10 percent.

They have also requested that some of this money become available at once, so that it might be made useful in installing aids to air navigation. This expenditure would be prudent and wisely consummated. It might result in saving human life. But that recommendation has not yet been agreed upon. I trust it will be agreed upon tomorrow when we go into Committee of the Whole.

The committee allows $2,000,000 to be made available beginning with the first of the fiscal year 1938. They authorize the expenditure of three additional millions for the future recommendations of the department.

I think the committee acted wisely in making the appropriation far less than has been recommended either by the Transport Association or by the Copeland committee. Both of those recommendations for a higher amount are meritorious, but the money can be more wisely expended after time for investigation, after time for experimentation, and after time for the development of scientific apparatus as useful aids to navigation. It is futile to attempt to spend all of that money right now because in this scientific, romantic industry changes occur with great rapidity. Study should be made before the entire appropriation recommended by the investigating committees is made available. In other words, it is just as necessary to spend a dollar in experimentation as it is to spend a dollar in installation. So the appropriation of $15,000,000 as a 3-year plan, to be carried out by 1940, would put aviation at its highest degree of safety and efficiency.

American aviation, as I said a moment ago, leads the world by comparison in every field and in every means of measurement.

The trouble with aviation in America and the cause of some of these conditions and disasters perhaps can be traced to the futile wave of economy that came into being in the last 2 years of the administration of President Hoover and carried on for a year or two after the advent of the present administration. Appropriations were reduced to the bone as they applied to this activity of Government. Experimental work and development were almost entirely eliminated; equipment became obsolete, disintegrated; and we paid dearly for that unwise and costly economy.

My recommendation, after years of study, after investigating this industry, would be to leave aviation, insofar as originating new lines, regulating schedules on existing lines, advertising for contracts for new service, regulating the collection, delivery, and dispatch of the mails are concerned, entirely with the Post Office Department. We have a number of bills pending in either one House or the other that would transfer the entire activity to the Interstate Commerce Commission. This would be a mistake. The Post Office Department pioneered this industry. Without the Department aviation would not be what it is today; it would not be in the advanced stage in which we find it. It is the Post Office Department, too, that pays the bill. I say to you, therefore, to leave as much of this industry in the Post Office Department as is possible. Leave with the Commerce Department the promotional work, the licensing of pilots, registry of ships, and all work of that nature which naturally goes with that great Department of Government. Leave with the Interstate Commerce Commission the regulation of rate, and give it, if you wish, the supervision of the inspection service. The Interstate Commerce Commission now inspects safety appliances and locomotives and boilers on our railroads and has charge of the enforcement of the 16-hour law, as well as of the 8-hour law. It might be well, therefore, to give that particular activity to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which would leave with that Commission the regulation of the rate structure and the supervision of the safety of air lines in operation.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Not until I complete the formal part of my statement; then I shall be pleased to yield.

Then the suggestion is made which I think is worthy and meritorious and one that should be put into operation by law, and that is that the pilots flying the air lines should become members of the Military Reserve Force. They should be put into a military training school every year and given 2 months of intensive military training. We would, as a result of such training, have the best pilot personnel for national defense of any country in the world. We would be doing more for our own national defense than we would be by appropriating millions of dollars for warships. We would improve the efficiency of the pilots in commercial aviation, because in this intensive training school they would be skilled in the use of modern, up-to-date, last-minute methods—and they are changing very rapidly. They would be schooled in the use of new instruments, new apparatus, new radio control, and all the rest of the improvements that are so constantly, continuously, and everlastingly going on in the aviation industry.

There should be also, as the result of law if necessary, regular, frequent, and open conferences on safety and on the promotion of aviation. These conferences should be held by the Commerce Department, and in them pilots, operators, and all those interested in aviation, as well as those in positions of authority in the Government touching this activity, should participate. These conferences should be continued year in and year out in order to keep pace with the times.

So I really believe that we are making excellent strides in aviation in this country; that we are overcoming the futile savings that resulted from the wave of economy that struck this House a few years ago; that we are bringing our industry up to date with the new Air Mail Act, the increase in air-mail volume, and the rapid rise in passenger and express revenue. These all indicate that aviation is here to stay, that it has made good, and that its safety is now at the very highest peak in all its history. Tomorrow American ships, clipper ships with their intrepid pilots, comparable to the captains who sailed the clipper ships of years ago, will fly over every ocean, bringing America closer to every other nation of the world, increasing the good will, and building up the commerce of this country.

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter I would leave with the Members. Years ago, when I was a boy, I was an apprentice learning the machinist trade in a railroad shop. I spent years of my early life working on the railroads. I sympathize with the boys who go into railroad shops, who have to crawl up into the boiler of a locomotive and there and in other equally hazardous places learn a trade, become skilled mechanics, and serve the Nation in this important vocation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. I recognize the fact that skilled mechanics are no longer as numerous as they were in the old days. The march of efficient machine methods, the coming of the assembly line and all those new and uncanny electrical devices, including the conveyors, have robbed men of an opportunity to create that which mankind utilizes and has placed the apprentice of today in the category of the forgotten man. Here is our opportunity to develop and train mechanics and skilled workers, to rescue that occupation, to give protection, care, and the interest of Government to the boys of America who seek thus to become the skilled workers of tomorrow.

Mr. STACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. STACK. While the gentleman has made a wonderful talk regarding aviation, he has failed to bring out what part the Government should play in building the airplanes.

Mr. MEAD. I am very glad the gentleman brought that out. I may say to him that by reason of the fact that we subsidize the air-mail industry to a limited degree by paying to them more than we receive in revenues, we encourage the building of ships. The Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps organizations in the development of their ships have their engineering corps investigating all of the work done in connection with the formation and the building of military ships. We also have a National Advisory Board for Aviation that is continually investigating developments in this particular field. All we have to do is to continue adequate appropriations for the air mail and to provide sufficient appropriations for the Department of Commerce and the other agencies of the Government interested in the well-being and upbuilding of aviation. In that manner we will be doing our share.

Mr. Chairman, the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training was created by the Secretary of Labor under authority granted by Executive Order No. 6750–C, June 27, 1934. The purpose of the order was to permit genuine apprentice training under National Recovery Administration codes, and at the same time prevent the exploitation of apprentices and the break-down of labor standards, insure an adequate training program on the job and prevent the overcrowding or shortage of labor in skilled trades. The committee, established to carry out the purposes of the order, was composed of representatives of the United States Department of Labor, the United States Office of Education, the National Recovery Administration, employers, and employees.

After the National Industrial Recovery Act was declared unconstitutional, the Federal committee was continued under the National Youth Administration, since in creating the National Youth Administration the President listed the promotion of apprenticeship as one of its chief functions. A representative of the National Youth Administration replaced the National Recovery Administration member of the committee, succeeding the representative of the N. R. A.

Following a letter from the President to the Secretary of Labor, dated September 19, 1936, requesting the transfer of the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training to the Department of Labor and suggesting that a request for an appropriation to cover this activity be included in the Department's budget, the Federal committee unanimously voted to approve such transfer and budget. The Department of Labor included an item for the continuance of this work in its appropriation request and the Budget Bureau recommended to Congress an appropriation of $56,900 for this work during the coming fiscal year.

The President's letter was prompted by the work which had been done by the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training working in cooperation with State apprenticeship committees. The activities of the Federal and State committees have brought about a widespread and enthusiastic interest in apprentice training and an understanding of the importance of apprenticeship as a sound employment policy. Evidence of this may be seen in the resolution passed at the 1936 convention of the American Federation of Labor commending the work of the committee and urging its continuance, and in a letter from Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor to the President dated October 30, 1936, requesting an appropriation for the committee under the Department of Labor. Employers as well as labor support the work which has been done by the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training. National associations of employers, such as the National Association of Master Plumbers, the International Society of Master Plumbers and Decorators, the National Founders Association, the Associated General Contractors are working with the committee and have endorsed its program. Under the leadership of the committee, national trade associations and labor organizations in two industries have formulated sound programs of apprentice training acceptable to both groups and in other industries plans for doing this are under way.

The increased interest and recent success in the promotion of apprenticeship are largely due to the recognition that there are two distinct groups of responsibilities in the promotion and operation of plans for apprentice training. One group deals with the apprentice as an employed worker—the conditions under which he works, his hours of work, his rates of pay, the length of his learning period, and the ratio of apprentices to journeymen so that overcrowding or shortage of skilled workers in the trades may be avoided in large part. The second group deals with the apprentice as a student—the related technical and supplemental instruction needed to make him a proficient worker and the supervision and coordination of this instruction with his job experience. The Department of Labor has jurisdiction over the first group of responsibilities; the Office of Education over the second.

In accordance with the suggestion of the President and in line with the thought of all parties interested in apprenticeship—including the United States Office of Education—the Department of Labor presented in its budget an item of $56,900 to carry on the work of the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training. A joint statement was submitted to the Appropriations Committee by the Secretary of Labor and the assistant commissioner in charge of vocational education setting forth the advisability of the separation of functions in connection with apprenticeship and the continuance of the present plan of operation. A copy of the memorandum is attached as exhibit C.

Notwithstanding the proved value of the activities under consideration and complete agreement as to the proper division of functions between the Department of Labor and the Office of Education in the promotion of apprenticeship, the Appropriations Committee has stricken from the bill language proposed in the appropriation request of the Department of Labor and has deleted this item. The committee stated that this action was primarily prompted by a consideration of the policy involved. The committee apparently felt that the proposal to continue the work of the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training under the Department of Labor, through the medium of an appropriation, was contrary to policy, and that such activity should have special consideration by the legislative committees of Congress. The Appropriations Committee further reported that some doubt exists as to whether the Office of Education in the Department of the Interior is not only authorized but equipped to handle a program of apprentice training along the projected lines.

There appears in the hearing records of the Appropriations Committee a statement by the Department of Labor showing that the proposed participation in an apprenticeship program was precisely within the province of the Department of Labor as set forth in the creative act of 1913 (37 Stat. 736, U. S. C., title 5, sec. 611). This act states:

> The purpose of the Department of Labor shall be to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment.

In addition, the act of February 23, 1917 (39 Stat. 932, U. S. C., title 20, sec. 17), as changed by Executive order dated June 10, 1933, transferring the functions of the Federal Board for Vocational Education to the Department of the Interior, which authorized studies, investigations, and reports with reference to apprenticeship also expressly provided that—

> When the Interior Department deems it advisable * * * such studies, investigations, and reports concerning trades and industries for the purposes of trade and industrial education may be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Labor.

This shows that when Federal funds were first appropriated for vocational education it was with the understanding that a close relationship should exist between the Federal office administering funds for trade and vocational education and the United States Department of Labor. It was intended by Congress that the primary interests of labor would be safeguarded through the Department of Labor. This is essential, inasmuch as the Office of Education has no authority to function in the field of labor standards and employment conditions.

It appears now that the Department of Labor is estopped from proceeding with an activity of vital interest to labor and directly concerned with the safeguarding of labor standards and the promotion of employment opportunities upon a purely technical construction by the Appropriations Committee. It is apparent that the Appropriations Committee need exercise no legislative function whatsoever in approving the request for funds for promotion of apprenticeship under the Department of Labor. It is also apparent that there is no need for legislation to enable the Department of Labor to carry out an activity directly in line with the purpose for which it was created.

The Appropriations Committee apparently did not find that there was any duplication of work. The Budget Director previously approved the requested item, so that it is evident that he found no duplication. Unless funds are made available to the Department of Labor under its requested appropriation, one important phase of the apprenticeship program must be abandoned, and the excellent progress made in apprenticeship within the last 2½ years will be lost.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert certain excerpts from the letters to which I just referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to make the request to insert excerpts in the House.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of our Subcommittee on Appropriations has gone into this bill so thoroughly and has so covered every phase of it that it is not my purpose to discuss the bill in detail. I do, however, want to touch one or two of the more important items and make some comments upon them.

As stated in the debate today, there is nothing political or partisan in this bill, and my remarks will not be either political or partisan.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has referred to an item that authorizes apprentice training, which came to us from the Budget. Your committee went into that question with a great deal of care. We had quite full hearings on it, and all through the discussion the question of whether an item such as this was permissible in an appropriation bill was paramount. I hope that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] will give me his attention, because I want to discuss the very point he has just raised.

Your committee examined the precedents as to whether or not this item was subject to a point of order on the ground it is legislation in an appropriation bill. Without going into the merits of the apprentice-training item or whether you are for it or against it, it seems to your committee it was clearly a piece of legislation in an appropriation bill; therefore your committee, acting in good faith to the House, determined that they could not include this item in the bill.

I may say parenthetically that I believe this is a worthy project and I think this should eventually be included in the Labor Department appropriation bill; but I am convinced it requires legislation from the proper committee of the House before we of the Appropriation Committee may consider it here.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Is there any legislation in this appropriation bill?

Mr. BACON. The report shows there are two minor pieces of legislation in the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. If that had not been the gentleman's answer, it would be novel, because I have yet to see an appropriation bill that did not have some legislation in it; therefore, if the only reason for striking out this item is because it is new legislation, it is not very appropriate in the consideration of an appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. The legislative provisions in this bill are in order, we think, as they are limitations and come within the Holman Rule; otherwise I do not think there is any legislation in the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Then this is a rare bill, because most appropriation bills do have legislation in them.

Mr. BACON. This question of apprentice training is a brand new activity that has never been considered by the Congress of the United States or by any legislative committee. I want to refer to some decisions that are directly in point, sustaining the contention that this item is legislation on an appropriation bill and therefore subject to a point of order.

Mr. Chairman, I have before me Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives, volume 7, and I refer to page 316. I refer to paragraphs 1264 and 1265, as follows:

The general statement of purpose for which a department is established, as set forth in the organic act creating it, is not to be construed as authorization for appropriations not specifically provided for in succeeding sections of the act providing for bureaus designated to carry out the declaration of purpose.

An appropriation to enable the Secretary of Labor to advance opportunities for profitable employment of wage earners was held not to be in order on an appropriation bill.

This point came up on February 28, 1919, when a Department of Labor appropriation bill was pending before the Congress. Mr. Gallivan, of Massachusetts, offered the following amendment as a new section to the bill:

To enable the Secretary of Labor to advance the opportunities for profitable employment of the wage earners of the United States there is hereby appropriated out of available money in the Treasury $10,033,808.10.

Mr. Blanton, of Texas, and Mr. Gould, of New York, raised the point of order on the amendment that it was legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. JAMES F. BYRNES, of South Carolina, the present Senator from South Carolina, argued in favor of the point of order.

After extended debate, the Chairman ruled:

The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment to insert a new section, as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of Labor to advance the opportunities for profitable employment of the wage earners of the United States there is hereby appropriated out of available moneys in the Treasury $10,023,000"—

And so forth.

To that amendment the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from New York make the point of order. Arguing the point of order, gentlemen who have discussed it cited certain language in the organic act which created the Department of Labor. That language is:

"The duties of the Department of Labor shall be to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment."

That language is relied upon, as the Chair understands, to make this amendment in order. The House has always been extremely careful in conferring the legislative power upon committees; at least, it has been so for 50 years. It has withheld from the Committee on Appropriations any power of legislation, and, naturally, having withheld that power, it has provided that no amendment to an appropriation bill if it carried legislation should be in order if offered on the floor of the House. This is very peculiar language as contained in this organic act. If the Committee on Appropriations could have rightfully brought in a proposition such as is contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and, of course, if it could not, an amendment from the floor of the House would be subject to the point of order. The Chair is unable to see where the limit on the Committee on Appropriations would end. If this—like the whereas of a resolution—should be held to authorize appropriations by the Committee on Appropriations, there is absolutely no limitation that you could put upon your Committee on Appropriations.

And, of course, if the Appropriations Committee could bring in a proposition, any amendment from the floor would be in order. The Chair thinks this amendment that is offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts makes new legislation, not authorized by any existing law, and that therefore it is obnoxious to the rule of the House. Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

I want to call attention to the fact the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at that time was Mr. John N. Garner, of Texas, one of the ablest parliamentarians the House has ever had.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to include at this point certain excerpts from Mr. Garner's decision, without repeating them here and taking up the time of the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That request will have to be made in the House.

Mr. BACON. I will not take the time of the Committee to read them, then, but will ask consent in the House to insert them in my remarks.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there for a brief question?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. First of all may I make my position clear? I realize the members of the committee were prompted by high and ethical reasons in the stand they have taken. They went into the matter very deeply, and they are to be congratulated. I think they have one of the very best chairmen in the House, as well as one of the very best ranking Members.

I merely want to have their help, assistance, and cooperation in making this appropriation a reality under proper conditions.

Mr. BACON. As far as I am concerned, I shall be very pleased to assist the gentleman in obtaining legislation from the Committee on Labor, in order that we may consider this proposal and include it in an orderly fashion in the appropriation bill.

Mr. MEAD. That is, providing it is not ruled out of order.

Mr. BACON. Of course, if it is authorized by a legislative committee, it is obviously in order in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MEAD. What I have in mind is, if it were declared out of order during the consideration of the bill tomorrow, we would then have to obtain legislation from the Committee on Labor?

Mr. BACON. When I get through reading this decision I think the gentleman will agree it would be considered not in order.

Later on, when the same bill was under consideration, the decision of Mr. Garner, Chairman of the Committee, was reaffirmed by another able parliamentarian, Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee.

Two years later a similar point of order was sustained by Mr. Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts, who was another very able parliamentarian. In Mr. Walsh's decision it was decided that—

Statements of purpose embodied in the organic act creating the Department of Labor were held not to authorize appropriations for establishment of an employment service.

The question of apprentice training is a new proposal. It has seemed to the subcommittee it would not be fair to the House to let it slip by in an appropriation bill without a complete and full discussion by the proper committee of the House having jurisdiction thereon. The proposal is very far reaching. I do not believe there were any members of the subcommittee who opposed the matter in principle, but we felt that any new activity created by an Executive order under the emergency powers given the President ought to have a full hearing before the proper committee of the House before it became permanent law. There is a very, very broad question of principle involved, and the members of the Committee on Appropriations felt they would not be keeping faith with the rules of the House and with the rules under which the Committee on Appropriations acts if they did not call this to the attention of the appropriate committee, in order that the matter may be thoroughly threshed out and brought up in a regular way. As a result of the decisions I have cited, the question of an employment service in the Department of Labor was presented to the Committee on Labor, a bill was passed, and we now carry an appropriation for an employment service in this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

We should follow the same procedure and pass enabling legislation for apprentice training.

If it is, I, for one, will gladly support a proposal to include the necessary amount to carry out the project in the Department of Labor appropriation bill.

I want to touch for a few minutes on one or two other important bureaus mentioned in this bill; first of all, the Department of State.

The normal functions of the Department of State cost the Government the net sum of approximately $10,400,000 a year. This is all the great "Department of Peace" costs the Treasury of the United States, the net sum of $10,400,000 a year. There are other items in the appropriation bill over which the State Department has little or no control, in which the Department merely acts as trustee; but the Foreign Service and the State Department proper cost under $10,500,000 net to the people of the United States per year.

I think the committee should feel this is a very moderate amount. I personally believe we will in future years have to increase this amount. There are a number of matters in the State Department proper that need attention, but your committee did not feel inclined to give them any increase because of the Budget limitations.

The Foreign Service itself is undermanned. There are 691 Foreign Service officers at the present time, and in 1931 there were 775. The Budget allowed and we have given 20 additional Foreign Service officers, but Mr. Secretary Hull asked for a great many more. I believe eventually, owing to the disturbed condition of the world, we will have to strengthen the Foreign Service of the United States and strengthen the hands of Mr. Hull.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. BACON. The State Department is the first line of defense, because the State Department is charged with keeping us out of war. It is poor economy to economize on the State Department. In these troublesome times in the world the State Department, being the great "Department of Peace", ought to have sufficient sums of money, and Secretary Hull's hands ought not to be tied.

I now yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Has any provision been made for any increases of salary in recognition of foreign service, such as that performed by Mr. Engert in Ethiopia and Mr. Wendelin in Spain, both of whom showed great courage in staying at their posts?

Mr. BACON. We hope that through lapses which will come about because of certain eliminations in the Foreign Service due to resignation and otherwise there will be a sufficient sum of money to make certain promotions in the Foreign Service. It is obviously unwise to add 20 men at the bottom unless a flow of promotions for meritorious service can be started toward the top. I believe we will be able to make some promotions, though no specific sum is provided in this bill to do so.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I know the fine work of these gentlemen deserves such increases.

Mr. BACON. May I commend the chairman of my subcommittee for the excellent report he made on the underpaid clerks, particularly the foreign clerks in our service. They are of utmost importance. I know in one case the chief of our mission is paying money out of his own pocket to provide the translators necessary for his office. This situation occurs in Japan, where obviously translators are extremely important and necessary. The increase we have allowed will be less than one-half what is necessary to make small increases in salaries to those receiving under $960 a year. It is, however, a beginning, and your committee hopes the Bureau of the Budget will remedy the situation in the bill next year.

I come now to the Bureau of Air Commerce in the Department of Commerce.

Your committee has made no cut in the amount granted by the Budget for new aids to navigation. It is absolutely essential that the air routes be marked by radio beams. The radio beam marks the channel through the air as the buoys mark the channel through the water in entering a harbor. It will require at least the $5,000,000 we have in this bill to complete the gap in the air routes of the United States. I believe it will take a great deal more money to really complete the job. This is one item the Congress has got to look forward to, and we will be obliged to make a further appropriation in the future. We must make the airways as safe as we possibly can. The private companies are not allowed to do it, even if they had the money to do it. We are appropriating $5,000,000 in this bill to make the aids to navigation more efficient, as well as to put in the additional aids that are so necessary. The air lines themselves are spending $11,000,000 this year to increase the safety of their own planes, twice as much money as the Government is spending to make the air routes safe; and Colonel Gorrell, who testified before your committee, stated that the air lines intended to spend $15,000,000 additional during the next year to improve the safety of the planes that carry mails and passengers. The Government must keep pace in making the aids as safe and as up to date as the planes that fly the passengers and the mails. The private companies are way ahead of the Government so far as safe navigation in the air is concerned. I shall submit a table in the extension of my remarks showing how the Government has been falling behind, not through the fault of the committee but because of the general economy program, in keeping up with the improvements in air navigation. I do not intend to take up any further time of the Committee to discuss the various items of the bill. I should like to discuss the Bureau of Prisons, the Bureau of Fisheries, and the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection and Navigation, because I think they present very important problems for the Department, as well as your committee, but the time is late. My chairman has covered the bill very thoroughly and in the extension of my remarks, which I shall ask when we go back into the House, I shall include some of the comments I had intended to make on the bill now, or else I will take time under the 5-minute rule. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, my attention has just been called to a copy of one of the local newspapers of Shreveport, La., bearing date of March 16, 1937, containing 30 legal advertisements of foreclosures being made by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the parish of Caddo, La. This list does not include the foreclosures which may have been brought and which may be advertised in other newspapers at the present time. Neither does this list include advertisements of other foreclosures being run by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the same paper at the present time.

Under the laws of the State of Louisiana, the foreclosing mortgagor is required to run a judicial advertisement in a daily newspaper announcing the foreclosure and the date and place of the sale. This advertisement must be run four times in a daily newspaper over a period of four consecutive weeks before the sale can be held.

I have been watching from time to time the list of foreclosures being made by the Shreveport office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation with grave concern. Ordinarily, when a home owner knows that he is unable to carry on with his home, and knows the futility of attempting to do so, he informs the owner of the mortgage of this fact and by agreement the property is deeded from the mortgage debtor to the mortgage owner. In this manner, no doubt, the Shreveport office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation disposes of cases of many borrowers who are unable to meet the monthly payments. It is the unusual case that requires foreclosures.

In speaking of this fact, I find that 30 homes are being advertised in one single issue of one of the local newspapers. This means in effect that within the next month 30 families will lose their homes in this city and will have to look for some other place of abode. I am informed that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation since its establishment in Shreveport, La., has made the sum of 2,350 loans. Therefore, we find in this issue of the newspaper that 1½ percent of all the property upon which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation holds a mortgage is being advertised under legal foreclosure in Shreveport proceedings.

Since January 1, 87 foreclosure suits have been filed against home owners in Caddo Parish, La., and since October 1 the Shreveport office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has foreclosed against 135 home owners in this locality. I am informed that the usual old-line insurance companies which loan money on homes rarely exceed in repossession of homes for all purposes 6 percent of the total number of loans made. Yet we find in this city that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in less than 6 months' time has foreclosed upon approximately the same percent of people and taken their homes from them as the old-line companies do during the entire period of 8 or 10 years in the collection of their loans.

But to make the situation worse, I wish to say that lending agencies lend money on homes when times are fairly prosperous and, therefore, must accept the value upon the home as of the date of the application. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation made the loans in the depth of the depression when property had very little value. Since then, property values have been rising in every section of the United States. In Shreveport real-estate values have more than doubled during the last 3 years. Due to the improvement in business conditions and especially due to the oil development which continues apace in this oil section of the mid-continent area, a real house shortage exists in Shreveport, La. Because of this situation, I say, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will not deny, that the properties upon which they own mortgages have doubled in value since the mortgages were obtained.

There is something wrong with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the fourth congressional district. They tell me that the defendants in these foreclosure suits are, to some extent, 20 months or better in arrears on the payment of these mortgages. It may be that there is a faulty system of collection. It is true that the United States is not in the position of a good-natured philanthropist but rather it is in the position of a strict businessman who insists and has a right to the return of all money loaned. This does not explain the conditions existing at the present time in the fourth congressional district, however.

We have in Shreveport just as honest and conscientious citizenry as exists in any other part of the United States. We have people who understand the meaning of an obligation and where they are able to do so, intend to and do accordingly, carry out their contracts. These home owners constitute the backbone of my congressional district as well as the bulwark of the Nation. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation should grant every possible consideration to these heads of families who are struggling with a heavy burden in an effort to retain their homes for themselves and their children. I say that if, in the list of foreclosures, there exists one single family who unnecessarily loses its home, some one is at fault in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

When the crash came in 1930–31 in Shreveport, we found the banks closing and the financial institutions refusing to aid even the most worthy persons who because of the economic crisis were unable to carry on with their obligations. Values disappeared and refinancing was impossible. In such a situation came the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and it said to the people of Shreveport, in effect, here is a haven of refuge; you will be permitted to liquidate the indebtedness on your home in an orderly manner.

Several years have passed since then, and values and confidence have been to a large extent restored. And now the people of this city of northwest Louisiana find that they have jumped from the frying pan into the fire. They have been permitted to hold on for a little longer and to "cherish the fond delusion of hope" for a short time only to find their homes taken from them in spite of their every effort, every struggle, and every sacrifice.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation in Louisiana has been and is thoroughly politicalized. Mr. Paul B. Habans, State manager, of New Orleans, La., is a political appointment. He has politicalized the entire set-up. In the Shreveport office, up until last week, a close relative of the leader of the opposing faction, Mr. A. M. Leary, has been in active management of the office. Last week he retired to make a place for another political appointment, a Mr. Parker, of Monroe, La., whose chief claim to competency are his political views and activity.

I have analyzed the situation existing in Shreveport very carefully and I am of the opinion that this office should be thoroughly investigated from top to bottom. Unquestionably loans have been made which should have never been considered by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation of Shreveport, La. In the making of these loans certain institutions have been favored and individuals have been discriminated against. The Shreveport office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has accepted from some local financial institutions practically every bad loan on their books and has permitted these institutions to retain the loans in whose liquidating value they have full confidence.

I charge that the difficulty now that this office is having is in concealing the facts that have existed there for some time and should require immediate investigation.

As I have said before, irregularities exist in the Shreveport office which should require investigations. The large number of recurring foreclosures likewise should require investigation. I have discussed this matter with Mr. John W. Childress, assistant to the chairman, who promises his aid; but a more general investigation with a wider scope is needed. We are entitled to know here in Congress why certain irregularities have existed. We are also entitled to know why it is necessary that 6 percent of the loans out of this office be foreclosed within the last 6 months and where this folly of rushing into legal proceedings is going to lead.

I do not have the figures upon the number of homes which have been voluntarily returned by home owners who acknowledge their inability to pay. These figures are in the possession of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I merely have what is shown by the public records and should be sufficient to warrant an immediate investigation of the affairs in Shreveport, La.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT].

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, there is an old saying, "Of what should a man be proud if he is not proud of his friends?" and my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] this afternoon took occasion to refer to the Governor of our State as "the hired man."

I am happy to refer to Frank Murphy as a soldier, a district attorney, a mayor of Detroit, a Governor General of the Philippines, the first High Commissioner of the Philippines, a municipal judge and, now, the Governor of the State of Michigan. If there is one thing that Frank Murphy would be proud to be called, it would be the hired man of the underprivileged. [Applause.] Frank Murphy has been known throughout his entire public career as the champion of the underprivileged. Frank Murphy has been famous for his leniency and his charitable thought of the underprivileged. Frank Murphy has a heart bigger than the man himself, and with it all it is tempered with the greatest sense of justice. Frank Murphy lists among his friends both the rich and the poor, but by far would he prefer to be in Abe Lincoln's class, as the champion of the underprivileged.

I wish that the Committee would give me permission now to read from an editorial in the Detroit Free Press. I ask unanimous consent that I may read this editorial.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I think I know what is in the editorial and I agree with the Governor's statement about the enforcement of the law and the duty as well. He is entitled to the highest praise for his words, but did he himself follow the advice that he gave to others? Did he follow his words with action?

Mr. RABAUT. Let us see what the editorial says.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, this editorial is from the Detroit Free Press, under date of March 19. The Detroit Free Press most vigorously opposed the election of Frank Murphy as Governor of the State of Michigan. I quote it because so much has been said here about the sit-down strike and Governor Murphy's connection with it that I feel it proper for the House to know what the Republican press has to say about the statement of the great Democratic red-headed Governor of Michigan. The editorial is as follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press of Mar. 19, 1937]

THE GOVERNOR'S STATEMENT

The law-and-order statement by Governor Murphy merits wholehearted approval and support.

It is a statement the people of Michigan have long been waiting for. It is firm and clear. Already it seems to be having a healthful effect.

Nobody can mistake where the Governor stands with respect to the maintenance of order in Michigan, or can be doubtful about his disposition to do what is necessary for ending the impossible condition existing as a result of the epidemic spread of unlawful sit-down strikes.

Governor Murphy says plainly that the Government of Michigan will not forsake its responsibilities to maintain order and protect citizens in the full exercise of their legal rights. He points out that under their oaths, the Governor and the police officials have no alternative in the matter.

On the strength of what he says, the State will expect effective law enforcement.

At the same time, Governor Murphy makes it clear that he earnestly hopes to avoid any extraordinary action. What he said is a warning, but it is not a threat. He speaks to strikers as to reasonable men and women and fellow citizens.

He has no quarrel with workers because they are trying to obtain redress of grievances or because they are struggling to get relief from hard conditions. He has nothing to say against the use of the lawful strike as an instrument to gain those ends, where necessary.

The Governor sets his face only against the use of illegal and violent methods which tend to destroy law and order and jeopardize the State and the Nation, and which in the end inevitably will defeat the purposes of those who use them.

For as Governor Murphy says, when such things are resorted to, democratic rule is endangered and the way is prepared for the rule of mobs or dictators; at best democratic government is impaired, and social progress impeded.

"And", adds the Governor, "it should not be forgotten that personal liberty (the most precious possession of the common man and woman) will be of little value if the authority and integrity of the courts are not preserved and property rights protected."

That is sound talk. And the Governor might have said, too, that the present conditions in Detroit and Michigan already are injuring seriously the standing and reputation of the State throughout the Nation, and are threatening its business and industry so that any victory won by violent, lawless strike methods will be a very hollow triumph.

Agreements about bargaining and working conditions and rates of pay don't mean much if the jobs that make them valuable are gone.

Governor Murphy is doing his duty to the State. He also is performing a friendly service for labor.

That is the comment of the most bitter paper against the Democratic Party in the State of Michigan and I am happy to congratulate it today upon this candid statement.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I approve of all that the Governor said there, but was the Governor's statement about the sanctity of the law and the duty of everyone to obey the law and the court order made after or before he prevented the sheriff of Genesee County serving the writ issued by Judge Gadola of Flint?

Mr. RABAUT. This is about the Detroit situation, and was published on the 19th of this month.

Mr. HOFFMAN. After the Governor had prevented the officer at Flint from executing the process of the court?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to call to the attention of the Appropriations Committee the desperate situation in which employees of the United States district courts and the employees of the United States marshals' offices throughout the Nation find themselves. I make specific reference to the pay scale of these employees. The bailiffs in the district courts receive $4.50 a day for only such time as they actually put in. This makes the annual average scale below that which is necessary for the average self-respecting citizen. The deputy United States marshals, I would say, are in even worse condition because for most part they are younger men and have greater obligations.

In comparison to wages paid by first-class municipalities and salaries paid to deputy sheriffs, these Federal employees are unjustly treated.

The service rendered by deputy marshals in serving subpenas and certain court papers require extensive travel within the jurisdiction of the local court, and the mileage allowances, it is universally agreed, are insufficient to pay the cost on the deputies' investment and provide for the gasoline used in the conveyance, with the result that the meager salaries, which run from $115 to perhaps $135 per month, must be drawn upon to make up the losses incurred through the use of their automobiles.

The policy of the Department heretofore has been so short-sighted as to force some of these men to use streetcars, thus limiting the number of services on the part of a deputy in any working day, and this practice is not profitable for either the employee or the Department.

The only reason that these conditions exist is because the deputy marshals and bailiffs are not members of any association or trade union. Therefore, they have no one to speak for them. They are not in a position to force their demands upon the Government.

Under date of January 21, 1937, I brought these matters to the attention of the Attorney General, and I received a reply from him under date of February 8. For the benefit of the committee I insert copies of these letters to show that the Attorney General agrees with my deductions:

HOMER S. CUMMINGS,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CUMMINGS: I was privileged to write you in behalf of the employees connected with the United States marshal's office. As we go along we learn of additional injustices.

It has been brought to my attention that the bailiffs in the United States district courts receive pay at the rate of $4.50 per day and payable only when the court is in session.

It appears to me that the entire plan of the Justice Department as it applies to its employees, for want of a better term, may be called "scabby." Whoever may be responsible for this condition, certain I am it is not you up to and until this date, but from this time on you and I must share the responsibility for its continuance. When the bailiffs in the State courts of Michigan receive $3,300 per year and the deputy sheriffs, with no particular experience, receive from $1,800 to $2,100, it is a crying shame to pay Federal bailiffs $4.50 per day and trusted employees serving as deputy United States marshals at a ridiculously low rate.

Of course, I understand your position. You have recommended an increase. Somehow your ideas and mine seem to collide with the Budget Director, and the Appropriations Committee is always willing to accommodate the Budget Director. But, personally, I am of the opinion that it is a matter of obligation on the part of this administration to see that this iniquitous condition is changed.

I sincerely hope that in making your recommendations that you will again recommend a reasonable increase for the United States marshals' deputies and likewise, after careful analysis, recommend some reasonable basis for compensation for the court bailiffs.

I will be more than willing to cooperate with you in remedying this situation.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

JOHN D. DINGELL.

Hon. JOHN D. DINGELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of January 21, 1937, in reference to the pay of bailiffs in United States district courts is acknowledged herewith.

I agree with you that something should be done about the underpayment of bailiffs and deputy marshals, and we have requested additional funds to alleviate this situation as far as possible. The fundamental basis of correction, however, is through legislation, and please be assured that the Department is giving every consideration possible to this matter.

I appreciate your interest and cooperation very much.

With kind regards,

Sincerely yours,

HOMER S. CUMMINGS,
Attorney General.

Unfortunately, these employees are faced with almost insurmountable obstacles. First, the Judiciary Committee must authorize an increase after the Attorney General's office approves it. Then after an appropriation is authorized the Appropriations Committee must allow the necessary money to meet any increase in pay scales. The Appropriations Committee is governed by the recommendation of the Budget Director, and it seems that the Budget Director as well as the authorized legislative committees fail to act because these employees have no spokesman and certainly are not in a position to force the issue.

In my letter to the Attorney General I referred to the shabby treatment of these Department of Justice employees. For want of a more forceful or descriptive term, I called it "scabby", and on that point there is no discounting the phrase.

Mr. Chairman, I would have introduced a bill of my own, but after discussing the matter with several members of the Committee on the Judiciary I am assured that the committee has before it a bill which will take care of the situation and which will provide a scale of wages and allowances for mileage commensurate with the service rendered.

I sincerely hope that if and when the Judiciary Committee passes favorably upon the needs of these employees that the Appropriations Committee, without any regard whatsoever for a contrary opinion from the Budget Director, will discharge its duty and make the necessary appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I was glad this afternoon to hear the question brought up and also the promise of the committee for its support, pertaining to apprentice training. I believe that is one of the most important subjects that will come before this House through the Department of Labor this year. It is doing something for the youth of our country. I base my support on an experience of over 40 years ago. My parents apprenticed me out to learn the trade of foundry worker nearly 40 years ago, for $1 a day, for 11 hours. I was apprenticed upon the promise to be taught my trade. That was at the beginning of the machine age in my particular business. After working a few months upon one special machine I could produce as much work as a journeyman, receiving at that time possibly seven times as much pay. I rebelled. I had no place to appeal. I quit my job and I went to another town and got a job. Being under contract with the company, I was forced back to their employment to finish my time. Now I know that this is a condition, only it has been exaggerated a thousand times with the boys and girls of our country who are agreed to be apprenticed to a trade, to learn all of the different parts, that they are being exploited on one particular machine. At the end of 4 years' time, at small wages, these boys and girls went out into the world as specialists, and they were not equipped.

The result has been a shortage of skilled mechanics. Today in this country there is a real shortage of skilled mechanics in certain lines. This project is to throw a cloak of protection around these boys and girls in industry in a voluntary plan participated in by the company, the employee, and the Federal Government. It has been organized in 42 States and has been accepted. There are today 117 committees working in this country for the protection of young people in industry and for putting this project across. Three years ago I organized this committee in the State of Connecticut and saw the results. I am very much satisfied with the way it has worked out. If nobody else does, I shall present a bill that will bring this under the Department of Labor as one of its activities in a legal way, and I do hope that the Committee on Appropriations will see fit to help pass this bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I may say to the gentleman from Connecticut that, so far as I am concerned as one member of the Appropriations Committee, I shall be very glad to join in getting the necessary appropriations, provided we can do it in the Appropriations Committee. I think that the Secretary of Labor has been very negligent in not bringing this subject to the attention of the Committee on Labor in an orderly way before this time.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. McMILLAN. I can only say that the committee will go along with the gentleman's views on this matter if it is properly presented to the legislative committee and authorization is granted by the Congress providing for such a commission. The Appropriations Committee, however, is not a legislative committee, and under the circumstances a point of order will unquestionably be raised against the provision were it undertaken to be inserted in the bill at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I promise the chairman of this subcommittee that I shall bring in a bill putting this activity where it belongs—in the Department of Labor—and bringing it properly within the appropriation bill.

MEMORANDUM ON THE WORK OF THE FEDERAL COMMITTEE ON APPRENTICE TRAINING

The Federal Committee on Apprentice Training is a coordinated committee made up of representatives of the United States Office of Education, the Youth Administration, the United States Department of Labor, industry, and organized labor. It was created by Executive Order No. 6750–C (June 27, 1934) for the purpose of permitting genuine apprentice training under the National Recovery Administration codes and, at the same time, prevent the exploitation of apprentices and the break-down of labor standards. After the N. R. A. was declared unconstitutional, the Federal Committee was continued under the National Youth Administration. While apprenticeship solves in part the unemployed youth problem, it is primarily a long-time program covering a period of years and its promotion should be the function of a permanent department of the Government.

The President, in a letter to the Secretary of Labor, dated September 19, 1936, requested the transfer of the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training to the Department of Labor and suggested that a request for an appropriation to cover this activity be included in the Department's budget. The Budget Bureau recommended to Congress an appropriation of $56,900 for the continuation of this work during the coming fiscal year. This transfer and budget had the unanimous approval of the Federal Committee.

Scope of the program of the Committee

The objectives of the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training are to promote apprenticeship as a sound employment policy and to open up to young people opportunities to obtain training that will equip them for profitable employment. To this end the Committee has been active in:

1. Stimulating training of skilled workers in those trades where shortage is imminent and discouraging training in trades where obsolescence or other factors forecast overcrowding.

2. Bringing national trade associations and labor organizations together in the formulation of a sound program of apprentice training acceptable to both groups.

3. Stimulating the States to set up the necessary machinery for safeguarding and promoting the training of youth for the skilled trades.

4. Serving in an advisory capacity to both employers and employees in the formulation of practical training programs for skilled workers.

It will be seen that the work of the Committee is entirely voluntary and depends upon the acceptance by employers and employees of the services and advice of the Committee. It works through representative State committees that have been set up to establish policies for the administration of the State apprenticeship program. Each of these State committees has drawn up a plan of work which has been approved by the Federal Committee. Such State committees have been set up in 42 States. In addition to these committees, 117 local trade committees have been organized, composed of employers and journeymen in the trade, for the formulation of labor standards and the application of these standards to the training program in the trade.

The activities of the Federal Committee have brought a widespread and enthusiastic interest in apprentice training and an understanding of the importance of apprenticeship as a sound employment policy. One of its outstanding achievements has been its influence in upholding standards of apprenticeship at a time when the normal tendency would have been to put on learners without regard to supply and demand and standards of employment.

Up until the time that the Federal Committee became active there had been no adequate Federal or State machinery developed to promote uniformity and give protection to employment standards of apprenticeship. Because of this lack of machinery, this vital system of training has not kept pace with the needs of industry or with the opportunities for employment in the skilled trades. Labor has repeatedly expressed itself in opposition to any apprenticeship program that does not provide proper safeguards for labor standards. If young workers are to be apprenticed, the trade unions must be assured that the boy's interests will be safeguarded, that labor standards will be upheld, and that the apprentice will not be put on at the expense of the older worker. The Federal Committee on Apprentice Training has the cooperation and support of the trade-union movement and must be kept functioning if the future demands for skilled labor are to be properly met.

The Department of Labor was created "to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment." Certainly the activities of the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training are in line with these purposes. Its activities encroach in no way upon the work being done by the United States Office of Education but, on the contrary, increase the demands upon the school authorities for related instruction for apprentices. The division of the authority and responsibility between the Department of Labor and the Office of Education is clearly covered in the attached joint memorandum which was submitted to the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Labor.

The American Federation of Labor, at its last convention in Tampa, unanimously approved the work of the Federal Committee and urged that its activities be carried on as a regular function of the Department of Labor. Various State federations of labor have also gone on record in approval of the Committee's work. National programs for apprentice training have been worked out and approved by the National Society of Master Painters and Decorators, and the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers, and by the National Association of Master Plumbers, and the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Steamfitters. Other national joint programs of this sort are in the process of formulation. This development is meeting a long-felt need in the building and construction industry.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] is entitled to the thanks of the House for placing in the RECORD the editorial from the Detroit Free Press. I have no doubt but that every Member of the House agrees with the sentiments of that editorial, even though it comes from a Republican newspaper.

While the Governor there lays down a course of conduct for all public officials, and which meets with the approval of all, since the 30th day of December 1936, he has failed to follow that course which would permit him to be in line with the advice he gives the others. I mean that, while he has been depicted here as a friend of labor, thousands of men have been deprived of their jobs because the Governor refused or failed, if you prefer that word, to tell those strikers to leave those factories. I am firmly of the opinion, from information that I have of my own and what I have received from Flint and from Detroit, that had the Governor then said to these men in those factories, "You must get out and we will arbitrate this matter", we would have had no further trouble there.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. RABAUT. The gentleman pays a compliment to the Governor.

Mr. HOFFMAN. As to his words, yes—pardon me—but not as to his actions.

Mr. RABAUT. By inference and implication he gives the Governor credit for being able to do that which the officials could not do; he gives the Governor credit for doing everything that seemed humanly impossible for anybody else to do.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Governor Murphy laid down the correct rule, which all must fellow if this Nation is to endure as a democracy. When the Governor stated, in substance, that the use of illegal and violent methods which would tend to destroy law and order and jeopardize the State and Nation would in the end defeat the purpose of those who used them, we can all agree with and applaud him.

When he said, in substance, that when such things were resorted to democratic rule was in danger and the way is prepared for the rule of mobs or dictators, he again stated a fundamental truth which we all admit.

When he said, as the gentleman has quoted from this editorial, that—

> It should not be forgotten that personal liberty will be of little value if the authority and integrity of the courts are not preserved and property rights protected—he stated a principle which experience has demonstrated must govern the actions of all.

But when he gave the people of the State of Michigan and the strikers to understand there would be "no compulsion" he nullified all that he said, and when, by his conduct at Flint, he refused to permit the sheriff to uphold the authority and protect the integrity of the Circiut Court of Genesee County, then, as he himself said, the personal right of the citizen is of little value.

The Governor's words are all that any honest man can desire. His failure to inform the sit-down strikers at Flint and again at Detroit that the law must and would be enforced, his failure to take any action looking toward that end nullifies all his words and demonstrates once more that men must be judged by their acts rather than by their words. The acts of the Governor have demonstrated that the liberty of the citizen of Michigan, the right of the worker who desires to continue in his job, means nothing to him.

Our President by his silence lends support to these sit-down strikers. For more than 60 days, while this lawlessness has continued, while civil authority has been defied, while armed men have invaded our State, disturbed its peace, kidnaped factories and held them to ransom, the President of the United States has remained silent. Not one word of disapproval has come from the Chief Executive of the Nation.

The Clerk read the bill down to and including line 7, page 1.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BUCK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5779, the appropriation bill for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year 1938, had come to no resolution thereon.
